V. 11—13. The apostle closed the expressions of his affectionate and pious fervour of holy exultation, by pouring out the requests of his heart for the Christians at Thessalonica. He earnestly besought "God, even our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ as the incarnate Son, and as Head over all things to his church," to direct, and make plain his way unto them, by removing all those providential hinderances which had hitherto prevented him. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) He also entreated the Lord Jesus, (for as the former clause is an undeniable act of divine worship rendered to Christ as One with the Father, so this also seems to have been immediately addressed to him, Note, 2 Thes. 2:16,17.) that by further communications from his fulness, he would cause them to "increase in love of one another, and of all men," not excepting their persecutors; according to the various exercises of that holy affection, required by the commandments of God; and to "abound in this love," according to the nature and measure of the apostle's fervent, spiritual, and enlarged love of them. (Marg. Ref. i—m. Notes, 4:9—12. Phil. 1:9—11. 2 Thes. 1:3,4. 1 Pet. 1:22.) This he desired, in order to the "establishment of their hearts in holiness;" and that their affections, tempers, and conduct, might be "unblamable," in every part of their various duties to God, towards each other, and towards all men, in the several relations of life; and that it might at last be manifested that they were so, as in the presence of their holy and heart-searching God and Father, in that decisive day, "when the Lord Jesus shall come with all his holy ones," whether angels or redeemed sinners, to "judge the quick and dead." For the souls of the redeemed, who have died in the Lord, will descend with him from heaven, to be reunited to their glorified bodies: and the saints on earth will be changed, and meet the Lord in the air. (Marg. Ref. n—r. Notes, 4:13—18. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Jude 14—16.)—'This invocation of him' (Christ) 'by all Christians, in all places, must suppose him omniscient, omnipresent, and the Searcher of all hearts; and these are the properties of God alone.' Whitby.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The love which zealous ministers of Christ bear to their people, and the longing desires after their salvation, which they experience and desire to cherish, cannot wholly be separated from painful solicitude on their account. This often disposes them to renounce their own convenience, and to endure additional fatigue, in order to obtain satisfaction concerning them, and to promote their spiritual benefit. And it is a great advantage for such as are engaged at a distance from those, of whom they are thus "affectionately desirous," to have faithful fellow-labourers, whom they may employ in "establishing and comforting them concerning their faith."—In the most peaceful times, every Christian should "count his cost," and remember that the followers of Christ are

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle earnestly exhorts his brethren, to increasing in diligence in obeying Christ, 1, 2: and to chastity, and integrity in all things; as God had called them to holiness: and those who despised these admonitions, would despise God himself, 3—8. He calls on them to "abound more and more in love" of one another, 9, 10; to be industrious in their respective callings, 11, 12; and to moderate their sorrow for deceased believers, from assured expectation of the coming of Christ to raise the dead, to change the living, and to receive all his people to himself, 13—18.

FURTHERMORE then [a]we [b]beseech you, brethren, and [c]exhort you [d]by the Lord Jesus, that as [e]ye have received of us how [d]ye ought to walk and [e]to please God, [f]so ye would abound more and more.

2 For ye know [g]what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus.

3 For [h]this is the will of God, even [i]your sanctification, [k]that ye should abstain from fornication:

4 That every one of you [l]should know how to possess [m]his vessel in sanctification and [n]honour;

5 Not [o]in the lust of concupiscence, even [p]as the Gentiles which [q]know not God:

6 That no man [r]go beyond and [s]defraud his brother [t]in any matter: because that [u]the Lord is the avenger of all such, [v]as we also have forewarned you and testified.

7 For [w]God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness.

8 He therefore that [l]despiseth, [x]despiseth not

"appointed to suffer" affliction: (Note, Luke 14:25—33.) and ministers should not shun to forewarn their hearers; that they may be prepared for the cross, and meet every trial with watchfulness and prayer: as in this manner they will best be preserved constant and "steadfast in the faith." For the tempter has many artful devices: he knows how to suit his suggestions to men's dispositions, and to avail himself of their circumstances; and he will be sure to work on their hopes, fears, desires, or aversions, by the most subtle methods imaginable. So many indeed, who for a time made a creditable profession of the gospel, have been overcome in the day of trial, that the experienced minister will generally feel a degree of anxiety: and he will not fail to caution the people to be on their guard, "lest by any means the tempter should tempt them, and his labour should be in vain." But in proportion to these solicitudes will be his rejoicing, when he finds that his beloved children "stand fast in the faith," and walk in love; and that their remembrance of him, and affection to him, correspond with his feelings towards them. In proportion as he has the mind of St. Paul, (that is, the mind of Christ, Note, Heb. 12:2, 3.) he will be "comforted over them, in all his affliction and distress by their faith:" the pleasure of his life will greatly consist in seeing them "stand fast in the Lord," walking in his ordinances and commandments blameless, and in no degree moved by the reproaches of their enemies. He will feel, that he can never sufficiently "thank God for all the joy which" he derives from them, and the testimony of the acceptance of his labours which their conversion implies: and if he be absent from them, such good tidings of them will draw out his soul in more fervent prayers to God continually; that he may again enjoy the comfort of their beloved society, and "perfect what is lacking in their faith," to whatever hardships or perils this may expose him. Thus will he beseech "God, even our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, to direct his way unto them;" that he may again on earth meet with those whom he so tenderly loves: and that especially, the Lord would make them to "increase and abound in love one towards another, and towards all men;" and thus (for "love is the fulfilling of the law,") "establish their hearts unblamable in holiness, before God our Father, at the coming of the Lord Jesus, with all his saints;" when all such desires and prayers will fully be accomplished.—May the Lord make all, who are called the ministers of Christ, partakers of this faithful, loving, diligent, and disinterested spirit! May he prosper all their labours and "comfort their hearts," with numbers of converts like these Thessalonians; and may he send forth numbers of such labourers into all the nations of the earth!

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—5. It was further needful for the apostle to "entreat" the Thessalonians, with the most affectionate persuasions, and to "exhort" them with earnestness and authority, "to abound more and more" in the practice of all those duties, concerning which he had instructed them when at Thessalonica. They had "received" these instructions, in an obedient and teachable manner; and thus had learned how they ought to order their whole conduct, that they might "please God" in all their actions: and he now called upon them to be still more zealous in every good work, and assiduous in cultivating every holy disposition. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—f. Notes, Rom. 12:1, 2. Col. 1:9—14.) It was indeed unnecessary for him to enter into an exact detail of particulars; as they "knew what commandments he had given them in the name" and by the authority "of the Lord Jesus." (Marg. Ref. g. Note, Matt. 28:19, 20, v. 20.) For "their sanctification," or entire separation from all evil, and consecration to God; the complete mortification of the old corrupt nature, and the renewal of their souls to the divine image, by the influence of the Holy Spirit, through faith, constituted "the will of God" respecting them.—It was especially incumbent upon them "to abstain from fornication," as well as from adultery, and all other licentiousness, which was generally practised among the Gentiles: (Notes, Rom. 1:24—27. Eph. 4:17—19. Col. 3:5, 6. 1 Pet. 4:3—5.) that so every one of them might understand in what manner to possess his body, the receptacle of his rational soul, in a sanctified and honourable use of all its members, as "instruments of righteousness unto God." (Notes, Rom. 6:12, 13, 16—19. 1 Cor. 6:18—20.) and in an exact government of every sense and appetite, according to the divine law, and the ends intended by the all-wise Creator. (Marg. Ref. h—p.) Thus every man would act honourably, as a rational creature, and a worshipper of God: whereas all the defilements of the imagination and affections, and every kind of inordinate or forbidden indulgence, according to "the lust of concupiscence," would be exceedingly disgraceful and scandalous in a Christian; being an imitation of the base practices of the Gentiles, the worshippers of impure deities, and stangers to the holy character, law, and truth of God. (Notes, Acts 17:22—25. Rom. 1:28—32. 1 Cor. 15:31—34. Gal. 4:8—11.)

V. 6—8. In like manner, the apostle warned the Thessalonians, not to overreach, or defraud, their brethren or neighbours in any transaction; either by taking advantage of their ignorance, necessity, or credulity; by exacting immoderate profits; or by any of those artifices and subterfuges, which selfishness devises to impose upon the unwary, without ruining men's credit, or incurring punishment by human laws. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ex. 20:15. 1 Cor. 6:7—11.) Such dishonest persons might not be detected, or could not be called to account, by men; but the Lord would not suffer their hypocrisy and injustice to escape with impunity; being himself "the Avenger of all" clandestine frauds and impositions, as well as of open injustice and oppression. (Marg. Ref. s.) Of this the apostle had before warned the Thessalonians, when he was with them; and he had testified, that these practices should not escape the vengeance of God. For he had not called them into his family, in order to give them a license to live in an unholy manner, either by gratifying their sensual appetites, or their avarice; but that they might be taught, inclined, and enabled to walk before him in holiness. (Marg. Ref. t, u.)—The word "uncleanness," here used, has led many learned expositors to explain the sixth verse of clandestine adultery. But, if fornication were forbidden, adultery must be of course; for even the Gentiles condemned adultery, while they connived at fornication: nay, in fact, they sanctioned it, when committed only with slaves and courtezans: as it is evident from the writings of Demosthenes, Cicero, and others. This interpretation is far from the most obvious meaning of the passage: dishonesty is as inconsistent with Christianity, as licentiousness: and, in this overreaching, fraudulent manner, perhaps even more common: and the word "uncleanness" may either be referred to what went before, or be understood as a general word for wickedness, all which is filthiness in the sight of God.—Notwithstanding, the excellent state of the Thessalonian church, some might have found admission into it, who would speak of the doctrines and comforts of Christianity, and yet affect to despise these practical exhortations, as inconsistent with the grace and liberty of the gospel: but the apostle reminded them, that in so doing, they did not despise him, or Silvanus, or Timothy; but God himself, who had given them his Holy Spirit, by whose inspiration these exhortations had been written.—'In this passage St. Paul asserts his own inspiration, in the strongest terms and with the greatest solemnity.' Macknight.

9 But as [a]touching brotherly love [b]ye need not that I write unto you: [c]for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another.

10 And indeed ye do it toward [d]all the brethren which are in all Macedonia: but we beseech you, brethren, that [e]ye increase more and more;

11 And [f]that ye [g]study to be quiet, [h]and to do your own business, and [i]to work with your own hands, as we commanded you;

12 That [k]ye may walk honestly toward [l]them that are without, and that ye may have lack of [m]nothing.

13 But [n]I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them [o]which are asleep, that [p]ye sorrow not, even as others [q]which have no hope.

14 For [r]if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which [s]sleep in Jesus will [t]God bring with him.

15 For this we say unto you [u]by the word of the Lord, that we [v]which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not [x]prevent them which are [y]asleep.

16 For [z]the Lord himself shall descend from heaven [a]with a shout, with the voice of [b]the archangel, and [c]with the trump of God: [d]and the dead in Christ shall rise first:

17 Then [e]we which are alive and remain shall be [f]caught up together with them [g]in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: [h]and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

V. 9—12. In respect of "the new commandment," which Christ had given his disciples, of "loving one another," (Note, John 13:31—35.) the apostle need not write to the Thessalonians, concerning the ground, nature, exercises, fruits, and blessed effects of it: for they were "taught of God," by the illumination and sanctification of the Holy Spirit, thus to do; as it was an essential part of that holy state of the mind and affections which constituted "the new man," and counteracted and overpowered the selfishness of "the old man." (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 1 Pet. 1:22—25. 1 John 3:13—17.) Indeed, they did exercise "brotherly love," not only among one another, but towards all the Christians of the several churches in Macedonia: yet he would exhort them to "increase more and more," in the fervency of their love, and in all the fruits of it. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, 3:11—13. Phil. 1:9—11. 2 Thes. 1:3,4.) While men in general aspired to eminence, reputation, or authority, by an intermeddling and turbulent conduct, both in public and private stations, it should be their "ambition," to behave quietly, peaceably, and contentedly, in their own situations, however low and obscure; and to attend diligently to their proper work, in the community, in the church, and in relative life. And, as most of them were poor, or might be reduced to proverty for conscience' sake in one way or other, they ought to be industrious in manual labour, as the apostle had commanded them, at the time when he laboured for his bread among them. Thus they would be enabled to act honourably and creditably, among their unbelieving neighbours: paying all their dues, maintaining their families decently, and being preserved from seeking relief by any disgraceful services or compliances; as not having any want of things suited to their station, or requisite in order to relieve one another in their distresses. V. 13—18. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:20—28,50—54.) Perhaps he apostle heard, that some of the Thessalonian believers had lately died, or suffered martyrdom; and that their relatives and brethren were greatly dejected about them, not duly attending to the cons lations suggested by the gospel. He therefore "would not have them to be ignorant concerning those who were asleep" in Christ, that they were in a safe and happy state: seeing it was not proper for them to sorrow on these occasions, in so disconsolate a manner, or with such outward expressions of violent grief, as those who had no hope respecting their deceased friends, or expectation of meeting them again, were used to do. (Marg. Ref. m, o, p. Notes, Prov. 14:32. Eph. 2:11—13.) For "since" they believed "that Jesus" died for their "sins, and rose again for their justification;" they might thence assuredly infer, that God would raise again incorruptible the bodies of those who slept in Jesus; that they might be produced with him, and presented by him, at the last day. Death was become only a sleep "through Jesus," as the body felt no pain, and the soul was present with the Lord in holiness and felicity. (Marg. Ref. n, q. Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8. Phil. 1:21—26.) He must therefore "say unto them, by the word of the Lord," or by immediate revelation, that such of the whole multitude of believers, as should be found alive at his coming, would not enter into the full enjoyment of heavenly felicity, in body and soul, before their brethren, who had previously died and been buried. (Marg. Ref. t—y.) For at that solemn period, "the Lord Jesus" will be seen to "descend from heaven," with the acclamations of attending angels, "and the spirits of just men made perfect," and "the voice of the archangel," who will be appointed to lead the hierarchies of heaven, on this illustrious occasion; and with "the trumpet of God," sounding in a manner similar to what it did from mount Sinai, but doubtless far more loud and tremendous. (Marg. Ref. z—c. Note, Ex. 19:16—20.) Then, "all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and shall come forth;" but "the dead in Christ shall rise first," and be rendered incorruptible, even before their brethren, who never died, shall be changed. Immediately after, these "will be changed," and their bodies become immortal and spiritual. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—54. Phil. 3:20,21.) Thus will they be suddenly taken up together into "the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air;" that, being approved as heirs of the kingdom, the whole company may be his assessors in judgment, and then re-enter heaven with him triumphantly: and "so will they be for ever with the Lord." Wherefore the apostle exhorted the Thessalonians to comfort and encourage themselves and each other with these animating topics, under the loss of their brethren, the prospect of death, and all their trials and sorrows. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—i.)—Some suppose, that the apostle expected to live till the day of judgment, because he spoke in the first person plural concerning those who should be alive at that time: but he elsewhere spoke of being absent from the body, and of "being raised up with Jesus." (2 Cor. 4:14 5:8.) He was one who remained alive after others had been removed; his faith and hope annihilated, as it were, the intervening space: his love made him consider the cause of the whole multitude as his own; and it is evident that he did not speak it personally of himself: for when the Thessalonians imagined that "the day of judgment was at hand," he diligently set himself to rectify that mistake. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:1,2.) As the apostle expressly declares, that he "spake by the word of the Lord," or by divine inspiration; the consequences of allowing him to be mistaken in what he said, should very seriously be considered. Similar expressions may be found in other parts of Scripture. (Ps. 66:6. 81:5. Hos. 12:4.)—Some suppose that Christ himself was meant by "the archangel," being "the ruler of all angels;" but, as we must understand the words, "the Lord," of him, it seem... not natural to explain another term in the same sentence of him likewise: and many intimations are given of different ranks and orders among the holy angels. (Comp. 2 Pet. 2:11. with Jude 9. Notes, Eph. 1:15—23, v. 21. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 3:21, 22, v. 21. Jude 9,10.) The resurrection of believers is exclusively meant, as every attentive reader must perceive; and therefore all speculations concerning the bodies with which the wicked shall arise, (a subject on which the Scripture observes a profound silence,) must be wholly foreign to the subject. (Notes, Eph. 1:21. 3:9. 1 Pet. 3:22.) The notions which prevailed among the Gentiles, left them totally destitute of a firm, well-grounded, and animating hope of again meeting their deceased friends, in a state of happiness; and so do the notions on these subjects of merely nominal Christians.—Some expositors have said, that the expression, "So shall we ever be with the Lord," implies that the souls of believers are not previously, at least not permanently, with him: but has not the apostle expressly assured us of the contrary? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The ministers of Christ are bound to instruct their flocks, not only in the great doctrines and promises of the gospel; but also in every part of their duty, that they may "know how they ought to walk and to please God;" and Christians should as readily receive these instructions, as they do the most encouraging declarations of saving grace, and everlasting love. They should also take in good part the earnest, repeated, affectionate, and authoritative exhortations of their pastors; when they "beseech and charge" them to abound "more and more" in every good work, according to "the commandments given them in the name of the Lord Jesus." For, as all men come far short of absolute perfection; zealous ministers cannot be fully satisfied with the present measure of the people's fruitfulness, any more than humble Christians are with their own attainments.—"The will of God," as revealed in his holy law, and in his precious promises, implies his purpose of their complete sanctification: (Notes, Ps. 130:7,8. 2 Pet. 1:3,4.) we should therefore diligently follow after perfect holiness. And it may encourage those who long for more entire sanctification, to reflect, that in this respect, their will and that of God are now coincident. In aspiring after this renewal of the soul unto holiness, the strictest restraints must be imposed upon the appetites and senses of the body, and upon all those thoughts and inclinations of the mind, which are connected with them: that, not only "fornication" and gross transgressions may be abstained from; but that every one "may know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour;" at a distance from "the lust of concupiscence," which so shamefully degrades the immense numbers of those "who know not God." It is a deep disgrace to a rational creature to be a slave to his animal inclinations, and to act contrary to his better judgment, his true interest, or the welfare of his neighbour, for the sake of gratifications, of which the beasts are equally capable: but it is far more dishonourable for a spiritual man, a child of God, a member of Christ, a temple of the Holy Spirit, and an heir of heaven, to have his mind and body polluted, or unfitted for communion with God, by unlawful or inexpedient gratifications, or even by improper thoughts and desires. Yet, in many cases this will not be avoided, without very strict watchfulness, and fervent, persevering prayer; without diligence in every means of grace, and a constant care to shun all temptations or occasions of evil. It is equally inconsistent with the character of a Christian, to "go beyond or defraud his brother in any matter;" or to injure him in his property, reputation, or connexions. This too calls for the most diligent care, and the most impartial scrutiny into every part of our conduct: for self-love, and the customs of the world, and even former habits, will otherwise lead us, without reflection, in some measure, to violate the golden rule of "doing to others, as we would they should do unto us." If a believer be led to commit offences of this kind, the Lord will surely chastise him, and thus bring him to repent and forsake them: but if any cloak allowed dishonesty, with specious appearances of piety, or zeal for certain doctrines, however true, they will dreadfully find, "the Lord is the Avenger of all such;" and their present impunity will only tend to their heavier condemnation at last. (Note, Matt. 23:14.) Of this, the great champion for the doctrines of grace "forewarned" his new converts, his beloved Thessalonians; testifying that nothing could induce the Lord to connive at the want of strict honesty, in the dealings of men with each other. For the Lord has not called us into a state of peace with him, that we may go on in the polluting practice of worldly lusts; but that, depending on his promises, "we may cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God." (Note, 2 Cor. 7:1.) And let it be remembered, that he who despises such admonitions, does not so much despise him who enforces them from the pulpit or the press, as that God by whose Spirit they were originally dictated: yea, he as really despises God, as that man does, who contemns the message of salvation by the grace of the gospel. (Note, 1 Sam. 12:9,10.)

V. 9—18. All true believers are "taught of God to love one another" as brethren in Christ, and from love to his name: (Notes, 1 John 2:7—11. 3:13—15,18—24. 4:7,8. 5:1—3.) they remember the instructions they have received on that subject, which is so congenial to their new nature; by practice they acquire habits of kindness, compassion, forbearance, and forgiveness; they love their brethren, wherever they meet with them; and they feel an expansive benevolence to all mankind: yet, it is very proper to exhort them to "increase" in these things "more and more." It should also be the height of their ambition, to behave quietly and peaceably; avoiding all interference in other men's matters, diligently attending to their own duty; being willing to "labour, working with their own hands" in any honest calling; and to be active in every service, which their station in the church, the family, or the community requires of them. When Christians are thus industrious, and contented in obscure situations: submitting to many difficulties in order to pay every one his due; decently maintaining their families, devising by every means to live within the bounds of their income; having no need to raise contributions, in order to supply deficiencies, occasioned by improvidence or extravagance; and being ready to spare a little for the relief of their more indigent brethren and neighbours, they will be respectable themselves, and an honour to the profession of the gospel. And should disappointments and afflictions at any time render them incapable of acting according to their plan; they may expect candid allowance and cheerful assistance; as they will have a testimony in every one's conscience, that it is a real and unavoidable necessity.—Christianity does not forbid, grace does not extinguish, our natural affections; but only teaches us to regulate and moderate them. It therefore behooves believers, to mourn with resignation, even for such relatives as they cannot think of without discouragement in respect of their eternal state: but it is peculiarly improper for them to indulge grief and sorrow, "as men without hope, for those who sleep in Jesus;" whose souls are at rest with him, and whose bodies also shall be raised again, to attend the triumph of their once crucified and risen Redeemer. Indeed inconsolable sorrow, in such cases, however admired by the world, is rebellion against the appointment of God, and the offspring of unbelief; grief should no more be indulged and cherished, than our anger or other passions. Our own loss, on such occasions, we must feel and mourn for with submission to the will of God: but the separation will be short, the reunion rapturous, and the subsequent felicity uninterrupted, unalloyed, and eternal. Nor shall such of us, as endure the stroke of death, be eventually less favoured and happy than those who will be "found alive at the coming of the Lord;" that great event to which we should continually look forward. For when the incarnate Lord of all worlds shall appear, in "his own glory, and in that of the Father, with all his holy angels;" at his summons, attended "with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God," "the dead in Christ shall rise first;" and, being joined by their brethren then living on the earth, "they shall meet their Lord in the air," with unutterable joy, and be for ever with him in the regions of perfect felicity. May we, by realizing faith and hope, continually anticipate that solemn but joyful period; and comfort ourselves and each other with these words of truth and love! (P. O. 1 Cor. 15:41—58.)

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—3. The apostle did not think it needful to write to the Thessalonians concerning the precise time of Christ's coming; or the seasons appointed by God for the accomplishment of his promises and predictions. This was not a matter of revelation, and it did not belong to him or them to inquire into it, from an unavailing presumptuous curiosity. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Matt 24:45—51. 25:1—13. Mark 13:32—37. Acts 1:4—8, v. 7.) In general, they "perfectly knew," from his former instructions

4 But ye, brethren, [i]are not in darkness, that that day should [k]overtake you as a thief.

5 Ye are all [l]the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness.

6 Therefore [m]let us not sleep, as do others; but let us [n]watch and be [o]sober.

7 For [p]they that sleep, sleep in the night; [q]and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night.

8 But let us, [r]who are of the day, be sober, putting on [s]the breastplate of faith and love; and for a helmet, [t]the hope of salvation:

9 For God hath [u]not appointed us to wrath; but to [x]obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ,

10 Who [y]died for us, that, [z]whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.

11 [a]Wherefore, [b]comfort yourselves together [c]and edify one another, [c]even as also ye do.

that "the day of the Lord was coming as a thief in the night." (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, Matt. 24:42—44. 2 Pet. 3:10—13. Rev. 16:12—16.) The thief breaks into the house, while the family is asleep, and unprepared for resistance; and thus excites great terror, and plunders or murders as he pleases: thus the day of the Lord is coming on the ignorant, the careless, the secure, and unbelieving, when they do not expect it; it will excite the most distressing consternation, and will plunge them into the most tremendous destruction.—As the hour of death is the same to each person, which judgment will be to mankind in general; so the same remarks and illustrations equally answer to both cases: and when sinners are flattering themselves with the hope of "peace and safety," then sudden destruction will come upon them. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Note, Luke 12:15—21, v. 20. 21:34—36.) This is further illustrated by another most striking similitude: as the woman with child, often when she is thinking of something else, is suddenly seized with her travailing pangs, which will unavoidably increase upon her; so ungodly men have abundant reason to look forward with terror to death and judgment: yet, they are employed and amused by so many other matters, that they are suddenly surprized with those solemn events, when they least expect them; and this first astonishment will be followed with increasing misery, from which it will be impossible for them ever to escape. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, Ps. 48:4—7. Is. 21:3—5. Dan. 5:5—9,30,31. Matt. 22:32—35.) The former chapter ends with a special revelation, concerning the Lord's coming to judgment; and the beginning of this ought certainly to be interpreted of the same grand events.

V. 4—11. The apostle judged it needful to give these warnings, for the benefit of those who were negligent in preparing for "the coming of the Lord:" yet, he was well satisfied as to the Christians at Thessalonica in general. They not only enjoyed the outward light of the gospel, and professed to believe and walk in it; but he was persuaded, that they were really "delivered from the power of darkness," and the ignorance and wickedness of their heathen state. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Acts 26:16—18. Col. 1:9—14.) They were not, therefore, in danger of being overtaken by the day of the Lord, when unprepared; as the thief surprises those that are asleep. They were all, according to their profession, nay, according to his confidence in them, "the children of light and of the day;" (Notes, John 8:12. 12:34—36. Eph. 5:8—14.) for none of Christ's true disciples were "of the night, or of darkness." They neither continued in ignorance or under delusion, nor lived in wickedness, nor wanted concealment for their secret practices: but, being delivered from the thick darkness of heathenism, or the comparative darkness of Judaism, they enjoyed and walked according to the clear light of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, Is. 60:1—3. 1 John 1:5—7. 2:7—11.) It behooved them, therefore, to act up to their privileges; and not to be supine, indolent, careless, and unwatchful, as others were, or as "the rest of mankind" were: but to be vigilant, circumspect, upon their guard against the assaults and stratagems of their enemies, and attentive to every opportunity of duty; and to be serious, considerate, moderate in every thing of a secular nature, and indifferent as to all animal indulgences. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, 1 Pet. 2:9—12. 4:1—5,7. P. O. 1—11. 5:8,9.) In general, men choose to sleep during the quiet of the night; and to be drunken or riotous, when others were asleep, that their excess might be the less noticed. In like manner, all sloth, unwatchfulness, intemperance, or excessive worldly pursuits, were more consistent with the condition of benighted heathens, than with that of Christians; who would, as it were, turn the day into night, if they were betrayed into any such practices. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Note, Rom. 13:11—14.) As therefore they enjoyed the full light of "the Sun of righteousness," they ought to "be sober and vigilant:" for they had not only a great work to do; but an arduous warfare to maintain, against numerous, potent, active, and subtle enemies. (Notes, Eph. 6:10—20.) They ought to stand armed like soldiers, and to be vigilant as sentinels: while faith in Christ, and a firm belief of the divine word, with reliance on the promises, and love to God, to Christ Jesus, to holiness, to each other, and to all men, constituted "a breastplate," to defend their heart and mind from mortal wounds; and a well-grounded, realizing "hope" of eternal happiness and complete salvation, was like "a helmet" to cover their heads in the day of battle, to defend them from the fear of the most cruel persecutors. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Heb. 6:11—20, v. 19. 1 Pet. 1:3—5,13—16. 1 John 1:1—4.) This hope they were warranted to entertain; as their conversion proved, that "God had not appointed them to" endure the severity of his "wrath," which their sins had deserved; but had "chosen them to obtain salvation" of his free mercy, through Jesus Christ; who had willingly suffered death to atone for their sins, and to ransom their souls; that "whether they waked or slept," whether they lived or died, or in whatever circumstances they were found at death, or at the coming of their Lord, they might live together with him in glory. (Marg. Ref. u—z. 1:1—4. Rom. 5:3—10. 8: 28—31. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) They ought therefore to comfort themselves, and each other, when they met together, by mutual exhortations and encouragements; while every individual endeavoured to animate his brethren, and especially his most intimate friend and companion; and thus to instruct and edify one another in faith and holiness, as they had already begun to do. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—c.)—They that be drunken, &c. V. 12—15. It is evident, that the apostle, either personally, or by Timothy, Titus, and others of his fellow-labourers, used to "ordain elders in every city:" (Notes, Acts 14:21—23. 20: 17—28. 1 Tim. 5:21,22. 2 Tim. 2:1,2. Tit. 1:5—9.) and, though no mention is made of this, either in the brief history of his labours at Thessalonica, or in the opening of the epistle; there can be no reasonable doubt, that he had appointed elders over the church in that city also. It was their office to "labour" among the people, in preaching the word of God, and in every means of promoting their edification, and the conversion of sinners: to preside in the regulation and conduct of public worship, and in the management of their spiritual concerns; as placed over them in the Lord, to act by his authority and in his name: and to admonish, reprove, and warn such persons as acted wrong, or were likely to be drawn aside. The apostle therefore exhorted the people to be observant of these teachers and rulers, to acknowledge them as the Lord's stewards, and to regard their admonitions; and they were directed not only to love them as Christians, but to "esteem them more abundantly in love for their works' sake;" and to show them all respect and kindness, in return for the benefit which they derived from their faithful labours; that, under their guidance and instruction, they might live in entire harmony with each other. (Marg. Ref. d—i.)—The apostle on the other hand exhorted the pastors, and others in conjunction with them, to warn, reprove, and censure such persons as were unruly, and acted like soldiers who quit their ranks; to comfort those who were weak in the faith, timorous, discouraged through temptation, and harassed by perplexities, fears, and misapprehensions; to support by proper instructions and every encouraging topic, such as were ready to stumble, or were of a weak and feeble capacity; as well as to support and provide for those who were sick, and unable to maintain themselves. (Marg. Ref. k—o. Notes, Is. 35:3,4. 40:1,2. Matt. 12:14—21. Acts 20:32—35, v. 35.) At the same time, it was incumbent on them, to exercise patience and long-suffering towards persons of all kinds; behaving with tenderness and meekness even to those who acted in the most ungrateful or perverse manner. Indeed all of them ought to be extremely watchful, lest injuries and insults should induce them to "render evil for evil." Let them see to it, that on no account whatever, they did this "to any man," however inexcusable his conduct might be; on the contrary they ought steadily to persevere in all those things which were kind, benevolent, beneficent, and useful, "both among themselves and towards all men," without excepting even their virulent persecutors. (Marg. Ref. p—t. Notes, Prov. 24:17,18,29. 25:21,22. Rom. 12:14—21. 1 Pet. 3:8—12.) This may also imply an instruction to the pastors and other Christians, to watch over their brethren; and if they perceived any indications of a bitter and vindictive spirit, to repress it by every suitable means, and with all their influence.

V. 16—22. The apostle exhorted the Christians at Thessalonica to consider it as their duty, as well as privilege, to be "always rejoicing" in the Lord. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, Hab. 3:17—19. Rom. 5:3—5. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3. 4:4.) He also directed them to pray incessantly, at stated seasons, occasionally, and with frequent ejaculations; and to watch against every thing which could put them out of frame for this important privilege and duty: (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, Luke 18:1—8. Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4.) to "give thanks" also in every thing, and in all circumstances, as all their mercies were unmerited, and all their trials would prove beneficial: so that this constant spirit of gratitude was "the will of God concerning them," as his children in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, Phil. 4:5,6. Col. 3:16, 17. Heb. 13:15,16. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.)—Many have explained "quenching the Spirit," of restraining the exercise of spiritual gifts, in themselves or others: but doubtless it relates principally to the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit, in the hearts of believers; not excluding his strivings and convictions in the hearts and consciences of sinners. These sacred influences tend to kindle a flame of sacred love in the soul: but they may be quenched, by evil tempers, by procrastination, by worldly cares, by inexpedient indulgences, by trifling company, or by negligence; even as fire may be quenched with water, and will go out if it be not supplied with fuel, if it want air, or be choaked with ashes. Thus convictions are often finally extinguished, and the Holy Spirit will "no more strive with men:" (Note, Gen. 6:3.) and thus believers often greatly damp the holy ardour of their souls, mar their own comfort, and impede their growth in grace; by not giving themselves up without delay to those spiritual affections, which are excited by the Holy Spirit, and by "quenching" them in the manner before mentioned: and this is the direct opposite to "quenching the fiery darts of the wicked one." (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Eph. 4:30—32. 6:14—17.)—The apostle also warned his brethren, "not to despise prophesyings;" or those instructions and intimations of the divine will, which were given them by the prophets, either in explaining the Scriptures, or from immediate suggestions of the Spirit. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 1 Cor. 14:) The exhortation may also fairly include the more ordinary preaching of God's word.—Yet, as there would be many false teachers, and erroneous doctrines propagated by them; they must be careful to "prove," or try, both the teachers and their instructions, by the word of God; that they might reject what was spurious, and adhere to what was good and excellent. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Is. 8:20. 1 John 4:1—3.) And, not only were they exhorted to abstain from evident evil; but from every thing which appeared to be sinful, either in their own judgment, or in that of others; and to do nothing, concerning the lawfulness of which they doubted; or which might appear suspicious to those around them, and so prejudice them against the truth. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Rom. 14:19—23. 2 Cor. 8:16—24, v. 21.)—No doubt, cases often arise, in which we are required to do those things that appear evil to misinformed, prejudiced, and unreasonable men; in order to obey the commands of God, and to follow the clear dictates of our own consciences. But these are exceptions to the general rule, which could not be particularized in so compendious an exhortation: and they seem to be the only exceptions. For it is better to avoid what appears evil to others, though lawful in itself, if it can be done with a safe conscience; than by an uncharitable exercise of our Christian liberty, to cause our weak brother to offend, or to prejudice others against the gospel. (Notes, Rom. 12:17—21. 14:13—18. 15:1—3. 1 Cor. 8:7—13. 10:23—33.)—The Spirit. (19) 'That is, the afflatus, and light of God shining into our minds. But, some one will say, if that be never extinguished in the elect, this is commanded in vain. This, however, I strenuously deny. Nay, for this reason it is not extinguished in the elect, because they cherish it; and they are induced by these exhortations to cherish it. For he, who hath determined never wholly to extinguish his Spirit in the elect, hath also made known by what means he will cherish it, namely, by the progress of his people in piety.' Beza.—Prove, &c. (21) 'The apostle does not here bid the guides of the church try all things, and the people hold fast that which they delivered to them; but gives an injunction common to all Christians, having "their senses exercised to discern good and evil;" to all who are obliged "to hold fast that which is good," and not to believe false prophets: which is a strong argument for the perspicuity and sufficiency of holy Scripture for this work, and against the necessity of a living judge. For he that must "try all things," must also try the doctrine of this living judge, and therefore till he hath made this trial, must not admit his doctrine as an article of Christian faith. For these words plainly teach, that what we must hold fast, must first be tried. Hearers, says St. Basil, who are instructed in the Scriptures, ought to try the things spoken by their teachers; ... and receive those doctrines which are consonant, and reject those things which are alien from the Holy Scriptures.' Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. 15:10 11. Luke 12:54—57. Acts 17:10—15.)

V. 23—28. The apostle subjoined to his exhortations, fervent prayers to God; knowing that his efficacious grace alone could produce "the will and power," to do all the things to which he exhorted them. He besought the "very God of peace," "as in Christ reconciling the world unto himself;" and as actually reconciled to believers, and the Author of all their inward and outward peace; that he would sanctify them wholly and in respect of their entire nature; as consisting of a rational and immortal soul, an animal life with its various sensitive appetites, and a material body: that every sense, member, organ, and faculty, might be completely purified, and devoted to the service of God; and that thus they might be preserved blameless till the coming of Christ. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Note, 3:11—13.)—He was confident that the church at Thessalonica consisted in general of true believers: and, as he was assured of the Lord's faithfulness to his promises, and covenant engagements to his people, whom he had called by his grace; so he was satisfied that he would fully grant his prayer for them. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 10:13—17. Phil. 1:3—8.)—Having therefore desired them also to pray for him, and solemnly charged them by the authority of the Lord Jesus, to let this epistle be read to all the holy brethren, the saints that formed their church; he concluded with his usual salutations and benedictions. (Marg. Ref. o—t.)—The very God of peace. (23) Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—21. 2 Thes. 3:16. Heb. 13:20,21.—Charge you, &c. (27) It seems evident, that this was addressed to the pastors of the church, and not to believers in general: else the persons charged, and they for whose benefit the charge was given, would have been precisely the same.—The original is "I adjure you."—The solemn charge implies likewise a most decided claim to divine inspiration: for it evidently places this, and consequently the apostle's other epistle's, on the footing of the ancient Scriptures, "the oracles of God." (Note, Col. 4:15,16.) It likewise shows, both that oaths and adjurations are in some cases lawful; and that the subject, concerning which the apostle wrote, was considered by him as peculiarly important. This is worthy of the most serious consideration of all those, even among protestants, who do not make the reading of the Scriptures a part of the service, when they meet in the worship of God; and of those who read them in so careless and indistinct a manner, that the congregation cannot hear or understand them. The advantage to illiterate people, to the multitude who cannot read, or who can read but imperfectly, of an audible, distinct, and emphatical reading of the Scriptures in public, can scarcely be calculated. It will soon render even the best preaching more fully understood; and it will in some degree supply the deficiency, in other cases.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. Curious inquiries about "times and seasons," are commonly unprofitable and vain. "Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation:" the present time we ought to redeem, the present season of obtaining peace with God by faith in Christ, and of doing his will, we ought to embrace: and then we shall be safe and happy at all events. But, if we regard the Scripture, "we know perfectly, that the day of the Lord cometh, as a thief in the night;" and that when sinners are, presumptuously or carelessly, "saying peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, which they shall not escape." No man is sure that death and judgment will not thus surprise him; unless he continually expect and prepare for those approaching events. 'Numbers at this very hour are speaking peace and safety to themselves, over whose heads instantaneous destruction is hovering.' Doddridge. And how dreadful will be the astonishment and consternation of the scornful infidel, the careless profligate, the proud Pharisee, or the hardened hypocrite, when sudden destruction shall thus sieze upon him, and no possible method of escape can be found! As yet we are in the land of light, of hope, of prayer, of forgiveness; though we might justly long before this have been "cast into outer darkness." Nor are we enveloped with Pagan, Mohammedan, or Antichristian darkness and delusion: we have the light of the gospel, and the holy Scriptures afforded us; and we have been led to pay some attention to them. If then we be yet so in darkness, "that the day of the Lord would overtake us a thief," our guilt must be peculiarly aggravated. Let us therefore seriously inquire, whether we really be "the children of the light and of the day," by divine illumination, and by an obedient faith. Let us seek to render this evident, as well as to act consistently with our profession, by "casting off the works of darkness," and shaking off indolence and carelessness; that we "may not sleep as others do, but may watch and be sober." Let us leave sloth, self-indulgence, ungodliness, and worldly lusts, to "the children of the night and of darkness:" but let us, who profess "to be of the day, be sober," vigilant, circumspect, and armed with "the breastplate of faith and love," and with "hope as the helmet of salvation." Thus our evidence will continually increase, that "God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by the Lord Jesus;" and that "whether we wake or sleep, we shall" surely "live together with him." (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8.) And when we remember, that he purchased our deliverance from the wrath to come, by dying on the cross as a sacrifice for our sins; we shall not only be directed how to "comfort ourselves together," and to edify one another in "our most holy faith;" but we shall feel the constraining power of admiring, adoring, grateful love; and learn how to live to him, with whom we hope to live for ever in glory.

V. 12—22. The office of a minister calls a man to "labour" for the salvation of souls with unwearied assiduity, as well as to "preside over them in the Lord:" nor ought the spiritual authority ever to be separated from the "labouring in the word and doctrine:" though, alas, it very generally is!—Faithful pastors should be carefully distinguished from slothful, ambitious, or mercenary men, who have the name and garb of ministers: they should be owned and attended to, and their admonitions valued and obeyed; and they ought to be "esteemed very highly in love," not because of the name and office which they bear, but "for their work's sake," and in proportion to their skill, faithfulness, and diligence in it. They, therefore, are highly culpable, who despise the admonitions, reject the authority, and refuse respect and affection to the persons of faithful ministers: but such as expect the reputation, esteem, authority, or emolument of the ministry, without a diligent attention to its various and laborious duties, are even still more criminal. Outward respect may indeed be paid them: but it is impossible for intelligent Christians "to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake:" though they will compassionately mourn over, and pray for them.—Our love of "peace among ourselves," should not induce us to connive at sin: but we must, according to our several relations in the church, in domestic life, or in society, "warn," reprove, and censure "the unruly," as well as tenderly sooth and "comfort the feebleminded, and support the weak" in body or soul. We should also learn "patience towards all men," especially towards persons of weak capacities, or little faith; who are often very wearying with their complaints, scruples, doubts, mistakes, and infirmities; and yet give no reason to suspect their sincerity, but rather call for compassion; being harassed with sore temptations, which perhaps have an effect, for the time, upon their tempers. (Note, Gal. 6:1—5.) Even when we are injured in the most atrocious manner, we must "see to it, that" we on no account "render evil for evil to any man;" but must learn "to follow," with persevering constancy, "that which is good" and friendly, "both among ourselves and to all men;" as knowing what patience and mercy we have experienced and still continually need from God.—His glory is concerned in our "always rejoicing:" this will be greatly promoted, if we "pray without ceasing;" and in "every thing give thanks, according to the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning us." To make progress in this life of communion with God, we must be careful not "to quench the Spirit," by refusing compliance with his holy suggestions, or postponing the good works to which his influences tend to excite us. (Ec. 9:10.) We should also learn to pay a reverent attention to every message, delivered to us by his ministers; and thus we shall "grow in grace," and abound in consolation. Yet, as "Satan's ministers are transformed into the ministers of righteousness;" while we "despise not prophesyings," we must learn to prove and assay men and doctrines; that we may distinguish between truth and specious error, and so choose and cleave to that which is good and right: and that for the honour of the gospel, we may "abstain from all appearance of evil:" "providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men:" and taking heed, "that our good be not evil spoken of." (P. O. Rom. 12:9—16. 2 Cor. 8:16—24.)

V. 23—28. The exhortations above given, show us what we ought to be and to do: but we must remember, that our hearts are naturally opposite to them; nor can any inward and abiding change be wrought in us, save by a divine power. As therefore ministers should pray for their people, as well as exhort them; every individual should turn the precepts and promises of God into prayers, for himself and his brethren: and, while he uses every other means of grace, and vigilantly shuns all hinderances and temptation; he should still beseech "the God of peace himself, to sanctify him wholly, and that his spirit, and soul, and body, may be preserved blameless, until the coming of our Lord Jesus." If these be our earnest desires, fervent prayers, and diligent endeavours; the promises and covenant of our God, his power and love, and his immutable faithfulness, authorize our fullest assurance, that, having called us by his grace, he will keep us by the same, unto complete and everlasting salvation, whatever immense inward or outward difficulties may seem to render it impracticable.—The most eminent servants of Christ want and value the prayers of their weakest brethren. Let us be thankful that these excellent epistles are reserved for our perusal also: and while we remember, that the apostle "charged" the Thessalonians, by the authority of the Lord Jesus, to let them be read to all the holy brethren, some of whom might not be able to read them for themselves; we may be sure that an Antichrist alone would forbid the laity to read the Scriptures, lest they should lead them into heresy. What then shall we think of those protestants, even pastors and rulers, who oppose the circulation of the Scriptures, without note or comment, as greatly endangering either the church or the state, or both? We shall also hence learn the propriety of reading them in our public congregations; and we shall be stirred up to study them with more humble diligence and obedient faith; that thus "the grace of the Lord Jesus may be with us" also. (Note, 2 Cor. 13: 11—14.)

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

THIS Epistle is commonly supposed to have been written from Corinth, not very long after the foregoing, because Silvanus and Timothy still continued with Paul; but the evidence is not very conclusive, and some difficulties attend this opinion. (Note, 1:3, 4.) It is, however, certain that it was not sent from Athens, according to the spurious postscript.—The main object of the epistle seems to have been, to prevent mistakes, which the Christians at Thessalonica were about to fall into, concerning the near approach of the day of judgment; grounded in part on a misconstruction of some expressions in his former epistle, and of what the apostle had spoken when with them; but supported also by some person or persons making a claim to inspiration, and, as some think, by a forged epistle. As this opinion was of a very injurious tendency, the apostle strenuously opposed it. (Notes, 2:1—4.)—He had also heard of some individuals, who on religious pretences neglected their secular employments, and walked disorderly, whom he exhorted his brethren to censure and shun, yet so as to seek their good. Amidst a number of instructive warnings, exhortations, and encouragements, it contains a most remarkable prophecy; (Notes, 2:3—12.) the exact fulfilment of which is a full demonstration of the divine inspiration, by which the apostle wrote his epistles.—' Besides the general marks of its genuineness, and divine authority, which it bears in common with the rest of the epistles; it has one peculiar to itself, from the exact representation it contains of the papal power, under the characters of "the man of sin," and "the mystery of iniquity." For, considering how directly opposite the principles here described were to the genius of Christianity, it must appear, at the time when this epistle was written, highly improbable to all human apprehension, that they should ever prevail in the Christian church: and consequently a prediction like this, which answers in every particular so exactly to the event, must be allowed to carry its own evidence with it, and to prove that the author of it wrote under a divine influence.' Doddridge.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle salutes the Church of the Thessalonians, 1, 2; thanks God for their growth in faith and love; encourages their perseverance under persecutions, by the prospect of the coming of Christ; and shows how glorious he will then appear in the destruction of all unbelievers, and the complete salvation of his people, 3—10. He prays for their perfect sanctification, and meetness for heavenly felicity, by the grace, and for the glory of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, 11, 12.

PAUL, [a]and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ:

2 Grace [b]unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We [c]are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, [d]as it is meet, because that [e]your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other abundeth;

4 So that we ourselves [f]glory in you in the churches of God, for [g]your patience and faith in all [h]your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

5 Which is [i]a manifest token of the [k]righteous judgment of God, that ye [l]may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, [m]for which ye also suffer:

6 Seeing [n]it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you;

7 And to you, [o]who are troubled, rest with us, [p]when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with [q]his mighty angels,

8 In [r]flaming fire [s]taking [t]vengeance on them that [u]know not God, [v]and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

9 Who shall [w]be punished with everlasting destruction [x]from the presence of the Lord, and from [y]the glory of his power;

V. 3, 4. The apostle, since he wrote the foregoing epistle, had received further accounts concerning the church at Thessalonica, which were so fully satisfactory, that he deemed himself bound, to return continual thanks to God in their behalf. (Notes, 1 Thes. 1:1—8.) This was "meet" and right; seeing that, in answer to his prayers, and by means of his epistolary exhortations, they became more fully acquainted with divine truth, and grew stronger in faith, by an exceedingly rapid progress: and the "love" of every one of them towards all the rest, "abounded" in all its manifold exercises and beneficial effects: so that he rejoiced and gloried in them in the churches of God, showing them what flourishing Christians the Thessalonians were, and what a blessed seal God had given to his ministry in their conversion. (Marg. Ref.)—This may induce a doubt whether the epistle were written from Corinth or not: for, on that supposition, Paul had visited no other churches since he wrote the former epistle, except such as had been planted in that vicinity: and we can hardly suppose, that he only referred to what Timothy or Silvanus had said of them; if indeed they had left him for a season to visit other churches, and then returned. (Preface to 1 Thes.) However, he and his fellow-labourers gloried in the Thessalonians: because they endured various persecutions and heavy afflictions with exemplary patience and constant faith. We are not informed of the particulars relative to these persecutions; but they seem to have exposed them to very great hardships and dangers. (Notes, 2 Cor. 8:1—5. 1 Thes. 3:1—5.)

while suffering in the cause of Christ, and for "conscience' sake," was "a manifest token," or demonstration, "of the righteous judgment of God:" it fully proved that he would "judge the world in righteousness," and rectify all the apparent disorders of the present scene: seeing he left his blameless and zealous worshippers to endure persecutions and tribulations, and his enemies to prosper in their impious and iniquitous opposition against his cause and people. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Note, 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) Indeed, he permitted his servants to be afflicted, in order to prove and manifest their faith and grace, and to increase in them all holy dispositions and affections; that they might at length be "counted worthy," or proper persons to inherit that kingdom of heavenly glory, "which God hath prepared for them that love him;" in hope of which felicity they so patiently suffered, as well as from love to 'his kingdom of grace,' established upon earth, and in order to promote its prosperity and enlargement. For by these means it would be manifestly shown, to be perfectly just and "righteous" in God "to recompense tribulation" and anguish to those who troubled his harmless and holy friends and worshippers, by their cruel enmity and persecution, because of their relation and conformity to him; as they would thus evidently be proved to be his inveterate enemies. On the other hand, it would appear honourable to his justice, as well as his mercy, to bestow "rest" and felicity in heaven on those who willingly endured tribulation in his cause, for his sake, from his enemies, and according to his will: and indeed having given promises to this effect, his equity required the fulfilment of them. (Marg. Ref. l—o. Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. Luke 6:21—26.)—This righteous judgment of God will be executed, when "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed," as visibly descending from heaven, attended by "the angels of his power;" his creatures, worshippers, and servants, who shall then act as the ministers of his authority, in showing mercy and executing vengeance. (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. 16:24—28. 24:29—31. 25:31—33. Jude 14—16.) Then he will appear "in flaming fire," to burn up this visible creation, and this will be an emblem of his awful avenging justice. (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:5—9.) For he will take vengeance, not only on idolatrous Gentiles, persecuting Jews, and men of scandalous and abandoned characters, but on all those who continue strangers and enemies to the true God, and his holy worship and service; on all who have not so known him, as to fear, love, trust, and serve him; and on all, "who obey not the gospel of the Lord Jesus," by receiving him, relying on him, and submitting to him, as their Saviour and King. (Marg. Ref. q—t. Notes, Matt. 25:34—46. Rom. 2:4—16. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. Rev. 20:11—15.) All these, however numerous, or distinguished by rank, accomplishments, or splendid actions, "will be punished with eternal destruction," being banished as accursed, "from the presence of the Lord," in which alone felicity can be found; and finding his avenging frown, like lightning, to appal and torture their inmost souls, and "the glory of his power" irresistibly forcing them, with dreadful consternation, into the place of torment. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) This will be accomplished, when Jesus shall appear with divine majesty in human nature, to "be glorified by his saints:" as the riches of his love, the preciousness of his redemption, the efficacy of his grace, the power of his arm, and his faithfulness to his promises, will be most gloriously displayed in their complete salvation. And not only will he then be admired by those that now believe in him, who will then find their largest expectations far exceeded, and who will not think it possible sufficiently to adore and praise such a glorious benefactor; but he will be admired in them likewise, by all the inhabitants of heaven, who will celebrate the wonders wrought by him, in thus saving and exalting such mean, guilty, and polluted rebels and enemies, and the astonishing change effected in their character and condition. (Marg. Ref. z. Note, Num. 23:23. Ps. 126:1—3.) This the apostle was confident would be the case of the Christians at Thessalonica, because his "testimony" concerning Christ had been credited by them, and their faith had been manifested, by its genuine effects. V. 11, 12. In the prospect of the decisive season above mentioned, the apostle and his fellow-labourers prayed continually for their brethren at Thessalonica, that the Lord would vouchsafe them whatever was wanting to make them "meet" for this felicity, to which the gospel called them; that he would adjudge them to be entitled to it, "according to the grace" of the new Covenant in Christ; and that he would "accomplish the work" of complete sanctification, and prepare them for that glory, to which the sovereign good pleasure of his goodness and love had appointed them, and which he had great complacency and delight in conferring on them; (Note, Luke 12:22—34, v. 32.) that so he would finish the work by his almighty power, which he was carrying on in their souls, through faith, till at length it should be perfected in vision and enjoyment. (Marg. Ref. c—i.) This they prayed for, in order that "the name of Christ might be glorified in them," both by their present bold profession of his truth, and their holy conduct, and zealous labours to spread the gospel: and, at length, in the sight of the whole world to all eternity: and that they might also "be glorified in Christ," by perfectly bearing his image, enjoying his love, being owned as his brethren, and sharing all his honour, according to the infinite riches of the mercy and grace of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who have already distinguished themselves by "the work of faith, and the labour of love, and the patience of hope," are yet capable of "growing exceedingly" in all these things: for the highest attainments of saints on earth fall far beneath full perfection. (Note, Phil. 3:12—14.) When Christians thus "grow in grace," and abound in all the exercises of mutual love; the hearts of faithful and zealous ministers greatly rejoice: and they will feel themselves "bound to give thanks to God always for them, as it is meet;" and to speak of them "in the churches of God," to excite their thanksgivings also, and to animate them to a holy emulation. The patient sufferings of exemplary Christians, and the prosperity of ungodly men and cruel persecutors, fully demonstrate a future judgment: when all shall "discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not." (Note, Mal. 3:13—18, v. 18.) This assists us in explaining those mysteries of Providence, which would otherwise greatly perplex us: and we perceive that the devoted worshippers and beloved children of God are proved and purified in the fiery furnace of tribulation, "that they may be accounted worthy of that kingdom for which they suffer;" and that wicked men are permitted to prosper, that their rancorous enmity against God may be manifested, and the measure of their crimes filled up; and that all may see the glory of that justice which consigns them to the punishment intended for them. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) It must indeed at length appear evident to all rational creatures, that "it is righteous in God to recompense tribulation to those who trouble" his people, from hatred to his holy truth and service: and that it is honourable to all his perfections to give "rest" and felicity to those who have been troubled for his sake, and for their love to his cause and worship. Faith, anticipating the grand decisive day, is enabled by the light of revelation to read, and, in a measure, to understand the book of Providence; and thus to wait with composure and comfort for the coming of the Lord. That will be indeed "the day of wrath and of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God:" then the Saviour, once "a Man of sorrows," and generally despised, rejected, and disobeyed, will "be revealed, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance," not only on cruel oppressors, persecutors and murderers, or on scandalous profligates and depredators, but "on all who knew not God, and obeyed not the gospel of his Son;" whether infidels, Pharisees, scoffers, hypocrites,

CHAPTER II.

The apostle warns the Thessalonians against groundlessly supposing that the day of Christ was at hand, 1, 2; and shows that it must be preceded by a great apostacy; in which "the man of sin," by his blasphemies, usurpations, and impostures, would cause the destruction of numbers, and then sink himself into perdition, 3—12. He thanks God for his special and effectual grace shown in choosing and calling the Christians at Thessalonica, "unto salvation and glory," 13, 14. He exhorts them to steadfastness, 15: and prays that they may be "comforted, and established in every good word and work," 16, 17.

NOW [a]we beseech you, brethren, [b]by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, [c]and by our gathering together unto him, enthusiasts, or Antinomians, or however they might otherwise be denominated or distinguished. All these "shall be punished with an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord." The majesty of that countenance, which was once defiled with blood and spitting; and the glory of his power, who was once crucified in apparent weakness, shall be intolerable to all the multitudes of the wicked; and they will be wholly incapable of making the least resistance, when with tremendous frown he shall say to them, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!" But, at that awful season, he will come especially "to be glorified in his saints," who have here believed the testimony of God by his apostles concerning him, and thus learned to trust, love, obey, and rejoice in him whom they have not yet seen: and to know and worship God the Father in and through him. (Notes, John 20:24—29, vv. 28,29. 1 Pet. 1:8,9.) No words can possibly express the admiring and adoring gratitude and love, which will unite with the exulting joy and triumph of that happy period. All hopes and imaginations must fall immensely beneath those unutterable glories, and the holy affections with which they will be contemplated and adored. But every believer will then reflect, display and increase the manifested glory of the divine Saviour, and enhance the praises of all the inhabitants of heaven, "to the Lamb that was slain, and hath redeemed them to God with his blood." May we then "pray always," for ourselves and each other, that "our God may count us worthy of this calling, and fulfil in us all the good pleasure of his goodness, and the work of faith with power; that so the name of our Lord Jesus may be" finally "glorified in us," and our salvation; "and that we may be glorified in and with him, according to the grace of our God, and the Lord Jesus Christ." May we diligently seek to obtain and possess the full assurance, that this shall be our felicity, when "the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God:" and may we now do all in our power to promote and recommend the gospel, and to do good to our fellow-sinners and fellow-Christians. For thus glorifying him on earth, we may be sure of being for ever glorified with him in heaven!

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Having encouraged the faith, hope, and patience of the persecuted Thessalonians, by the prospect of Christ's coming to perfect their salvation; the apostle exhorted them, and even "besought them by the coming of Christ," and as they hoped to be "gathered together unto him" in glory; not to allow themselves to be easily deluded into the opinion, "that the day of Christ was at hand:" whether that opinion were propagated by men professing to speak by the Spirit of God; or whether it were grounded on something which he had spoken among them, or on a misconstruction of some expressions in his former epistle. (Marg. Ref. a—f. Note, 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) For such an erroneous expectation would disquiet their minds, and create in them needless troubles and perplexities: and when they found themselves disappointed in it, they might be tempted to question the truth of the gospel itself. It would at least take them off from the duties of their several callings in society; and their conduct, expectations, and disappointment might eventually render them the derision of their unbelieving neighbours. Several learned men would explain this, of our Lord's coming, in Providence, to destroy Jerusalem, and terminate the persecutions excited by the Jews: but that coming was very near; and the apostle earnestly warned his readers against supposing that the coming of which he spake was at hand. If, however, this had not been the case, what could there be, in the near approach of divine judgments on Judea, to excite any extraordinary commotion among the converts at Thessalonica, in Macedonia, nearly a thousand miles distant from Judea; and these chiefly from the Gentiles?

V. 3, 4. The apostle again most earnestly exhorted them, to "let no man deceive them, by any" artful device or pretence whatever into so injurious an expectation: and it is evident that this caution was not unnecessary; for notwithstanding it, many of the early Christians expected the day of judgment speedily to come, which betrayed them into various practical mistakes. But Paul, by the Spirit of prophecy, assured them, that Christ would not come to judgment, till "a falling away," or the apostacy, of a great body of professed Christians from the true gospel of Christ had previously taken place. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) Doubtless many apostacies occurred, in the primitive ages, under different heresiarchs but, all the circumstances of this prediction were never verified, except in that departure from the faith, and that usurpation and spiritual tyranny connected with it, which took place by means of the church of Rome: and the manifest absurdity of all other interpretations, as clearly shown in the controversies of those who contend for one or another of them against their opponents, abundantly prove this. No apostacy of equal magnitude and duration, no delusions equally pernicious and abominable, have taken place since the apostle's days. The imposture of Mohammed alone can be at all compared with it, and this could not be here intended: for that impostor and his successors were not placed "in the temple of God," the visible church; (Note, Rev. 11:1,2.) but without it, and in direct opposition to the very name of Christianity; they propagated their delusions mainly by the sword, and not by "lying miracles;" (Note, 8—12.) and indeed the impieties of Mohammed never equalled the blasphemies here predicted.—In connexion with this apostacy, "the man of sin would be revealed." In the language of prophecy, a king generally signifies a succession of monarchs, of the same family or dynasty, carrying on the same design. (Notes, Dan. 7:15—27.) Thus "the man of sin" does not mean a single person, but a succession of men, impious in themselves; and conducting the same wicked design of corrupting Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and practice; establishing an intolerable tyranny on religious pretences; and using all kinds of seduction, iniquity, and cruel persecution, to induce mankind to adopt the antichristian system. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Rev. 13:) This "man of sin" would be "the son of perdition;" (John 17:12.) a genuine descendant of Judas, the apostle and the traitor, who sold his Lord for money, and betrayed him with a kiss; a peculiar factor and agent of Satan, in destroying the souls of men; and finally sinking himself into perdition as his inheritance. (Notes, Rev. 17:7—14.) It is manifest, that no succession of men have yet appeared on earth, to whom this description fully accords, except that of the Roman pontiffs, as in succession the visible head of the Popish church.—This deceiver would "oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped," either by Christians or Pagans: thus the Roman pontiffs have opposed the truths, commandments, and disciples of Christ, in every age and by every means; they have opposed the prophetical office of Christ, by teaching human inventions; his priestly office, by the doctrine of human merits and created intercessors; and his kingly office, by changing and dispensing with his laws. (Notes, Dan. 11:34—45. 1 Tim. 4:1—5. 1 John 2:18,19.)—They have "exalted themselves above all that is called God, and is worshipped," by claiming authority to forgive sins, even in those who manifestly continue impenitent; by granting indulgences to men to break the commandments of God; by dispensing with his laws, and placing their own decrees above them, as if of superior validity; and by presuming to give meaning and authority to the Scriptures themselves; which must not be understood in any other sense than what they impose upon them. (Marg. Ref k—m.)—Moreover, this "man of sin" "sits as God in the temple of God," and we must therefore look for him within the visible church: there he blasphemously usurps the throne of God, showing himself to be God. Many Roman emperors affected divine honours and demanded adoration: but there was no antecedent "apostacy" from Christianity or the worship of JEHOVAH; and they might rather be said to sit in the temple of Jupiter or Mars, than in that of God; whose temple must be considered to be among his professed worshippers, and not among avowed heathens. But the Roman pontiff, claiming to be the universal head of the whole church of God; called by his flatterers 'Vice-God,' 'a God upon earth;' arrogating the title of 'his Holiness,' boasting of 'infallibility,' claiming a right to depose kings and bestow kingdoms on whom he pleases; with those impious claims before mentioned, answers so exactly to the description here given, that we cannot reasonably doubt for whom it was designed.

While the Roman pontiff opposes the worship of God, by enjoining the worship of images, and of saints and angels, and the authority of his laws, to enforce subjection to his own edicts; he himself may be called the great idol, as well as the great tyrant, of the Romish church; (Note, Rev. 13:13—17.) as he demands the most abject submission, and prostration from all men, both in body and soul, and pours contempt on all authority human and divine. But particulars cannot here be more fully insisted on. It suffices to show that the Roman pontiffs answered, and still do answer to this description, as the person intended is the archetype of an excellent portrait; and we may venture to assert, that no other succession of men ever did thus accord to it; perhaps no single individual within the visible church.—The apostles, at least after the gospel was preached to the Gentiles, never spoke of the temple at Jerusalem as the temple of God; but the Christian church in general, or believers in particular, are always denoted by that phrase.—The striking coincidence of this extraordinary prediction, with many parts of the prophecy of Daniel, and of the Revelation of St. John, may be seen to advantage, by consulting the marginal references; and, as far as the author's views of them are concerned, by examining the notes on the passages referred to in those prophecies.—Who opposeth, &c. V. 5—7. During the short time which the apostle spent at Thessalonica, he had stated these particulars to his converts, which they ought to have remembered. (Notes, Acts 17:1—9.) When they recollected what he had spoken upon this subject, they would know what "withheld," or retarded, this apostacy for the present; and so prevented its taking place openly and evidently, till the time appointed for it in the purpose of God. The Roman empire, united under one potent government, and extremely jealous of all other power and authority, prevented the establishment of that spiritual tyranny and usurpation, by which Satan was attempting to make his grand effort against Christianity: but it would not have been prudent for the apostle, explicitly to mention it, in an epistle for general perusal; nor would it have accorded to the style of prophecy: however, most of the fathers so far understood him, as to declare that Antichrist would not come, till after the downfal of the Roman empire. Had it not been for this obstacle, the evil would have broken out much sooner: for even when this was written, "the mystery of iniquity did already work." This grand and deep design of Satan, this mysterious system, which was founded in all kind of iniquities, or productive of them, being placed in direct opposition to the "great mystery of godliness," was already operating upon the minds of men. (Marg. Ref. q, s. Notes, 1 Tim. 3:16. 4:1—5. Rev. 17:3—5.) The ambition and avarice of some, who preached the gospel, and exercised spiritual gifts from corrupt motives; who opposed the apostles, in order to obtain authority, influence, and secular advantage; or who perverted the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, introducing false and selfish confidences, superstitions, will-worship, self-imposed austerities, and the worship of angels; and the disposition of many professed Christians to "follow their pernicious ways," were as a corrupt leaven, which, working secretly, would at length produce this great apostacy. (Notes, Col. 2:18—23. 2 Tim. 2:14—19. 3:1—9. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) But the Roman empire, which then "letted" or hindered its full effect, by keeping the church under persecution, and curbing all authority but its own, would continue to retard this event, until it should be removed out of the way. The conversion of the Roman emperors to Christianity, in the beginning of the fourth century, tended greatly to prepare things for this apostacy, by giving scope to the ambition and avarice of the ecclesiastics, and by multiplying exceedingly merely nominal Christians: but it was not till the subversion of the western empire by the northern nations, and the division of it into ten kingdoms, that way was made for the full establishment of the papal usurpation at Rome, the capital city of the empire. (Notes, Rev. 8: 11:—14:)

V. 8—12. The obstacle above-mentioned having been taken out of the way, "that wicked," or lawless one, would be revealed, and would display the deformity of his character without disguise, by endeavouring to exalt himself above all laws human and divine. But though this great usurper would "practise and prosper;" yet the Lord would at length consume him by "the spirit," or the breath, of his mouth. (Marg. Ref. u—y. Notes, Job 4:7—11. Is. 11:2—5. Rev. 19:11—16.) According to the predictions of his word, and by the preaching of his gospel attended by the influences of his Spirit, he would gradually waste and consume this antichristian tyranny, and terminate all his corruptions of the gospel. This he has been accomplishing, during the space of above three hundred years, since the first dawnings of the Reformation: he will shortly destroy the whole papal authority, and all obstinately attached to it, "by the brightness of his coming" to spread the gospel through the nations; (Notes, Rev. 18:—20:1—6.) and he will finally condemn, and punish with everlasting destruction, all the aotors in this grand delusion, when he shall come to judge the world. (Note, Rev. 20:11—15.) Such will certainly be the doom of this "lawless one," this "man of sin," this "son of perdition," whose coming would be attended, and whose success obtained, not by open force, but by the deep subtlety and peculiar "energy of Satan;" with the highest pretences of authority and claims of power; and with every kind of counterfeit signs and wonders, either of deep-laid human imposture, or of satanical operation, by which men would mimic the miracles of Christ and his apostles, as the Egyptian magicians did those of Moses. It would also be accompanied with all the various kinds of forgery, fraud, and imposture, with which men's senses and understandings have been deluded by artful deceivers, in different ages and nations of the world: and with every hypocritical device, which the ingenuity and sagacity of men or devils could possibly invent, to support the cause of unrighteousness, and delude the world into a stupid admiration, a blind reverence, and an implicit submission, to the arrogant claims and multiplied idolatries and abominations of this grand delusion. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) Thus, by artful stratagems and machinations, multitudes would be fatally deceived, among such as were in the way of perdition. For, seeing they had not "received the love of the truth," but had neglected or perverted the saving doctrine of the gospel, through pride, and carnal enmity; they would, for this cause, be left to judicial blindness; (Note, John 3:19—21.) and God would by means of these men, "send them a strong delusion," which would bind them fast in the chains of error and false confidence; so that they would be fascinated into the firm belief of Satan's lie, und venture their souls upon it. (Marg. Ref d—i. Notes, 1 Kings 22:19—23. Is. 6:9,10. 44:18—20. Ez. 14:9—11.) Thus, being held in impenitence and unbelief, and under the power of their own lusts, they would be left to manifest their enmity to God, and to fill up the measure of their sins; that they might be condemned at the day of judgment, and receive their merited punishment; even those who had not believed the truth of Christ, but "had pleasure in unrighteousness," and in the delusions of this great apostate and usurper, because it accorded to their pride, love of the lieved not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness. [Practical Observations.]

13 But we are bound to give thanks alway to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth:

14 Whereunto he called you by our gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.

15 Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle.

16 Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father, which hath loved us, and hath given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, 17 Comfort your hearts, and establish you in every good word and work.

world, and dislike to the spiritual worship and service of God: for this seems rather to refer to the deceived, than to the deceivers. It implied, that God would act in this matter, according to the general rule, of giving up those who obstinately hated the truth through love of sin, to be blinded by Satan; and that there would be a remnant, even under the deepest darkness of this imposter's reign, of another character and description.—Nothing can more exactly coincide with the system of popery, as it prevailed in the Roman church, and under the Roman pontiff for many ages, than this passage does. Even their boasted pretensions to miraculous powers: and the imposture or ambiguity of every instance, is the grand proof of all, that they were marked out by the Holy Spirit. And the adherence of the church of Rome, even to the present day, to the gross worship of images, saints, and angels; and to the doctrine of authoritative absolutions, dispensations, penances, purgatory, transubstantiation, and the merit of good works, proves that "the man of sin," though consuming by the Spirit and the word of Christ, is yet very far from being destroyed "by the brightness of his coming."—It is very wonderful, that any reflecting persons should ever think this prophecy applicable to the antichristian delusions of modern infidels or atheists, who have apostatized from a profession of Christianity; when the single expression, "signs and lying wonders," demonstrates that they could not be meant. Antichrist indeed has made strenuous efforts as an unmasked infidel; yet these short-lived appearances must not be compared with the permanent and wide-spread mischiefs of one thousand three hundred years. The original words may mean, either false and lying pretences to the power of working miracles, and the impostures by which they are rendered plausible; or they may relate to things really supernatural, when performed in support of false doctrine, and claims to a divine authority in propagating it. (Notes, Ex. 7:11,12. Deut. 13:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:6—9.)—Damned. (12) The original is judged, as in several other places; and, in such awful declarations, a needless and ungrounded asperity of language, in the translation, only gives occasion to objections, and so weakens the general effect. Yet, in this place the meaning is unequivocal, and judging such characters as are here described, at the coming of the Lord, must terminate in their eternal condemnation. But this is not always the case, when the same word is used. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:29—34.)

V. 13, 14. The apostle intimated in these verses, that even at the time when he wrote, "strong delusions" were sent to those who "received not the love of the truth that they might be saved:" he was therefore "bound to thank God always" for his brethren at Thessalonica; because it was evident that they were "beloved of the Lord," having been "from the beginning chosen to salvation." Some contend, that the apostle meant, the beginning of the gospel being preached to them; but he plainly distinguished this choice of them, from their calling, and spoke of the latter as the effect of the former.—The doctrine of election has been repeatedly considered. (Marg. Ref. m—p. Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 9: 10—14. Eph. 1:3—12.) We may here add, that if the "calling" of the Thessalonians was the effect of any preceding choice of them; it comes to the same thing, whether that choice was made the preceding day, or from "before the foundation of the world," or from eternity; except as the immutable perfection and purposes of God and his absolutely perfect prescience are concerned. Otherwise, if he acted wisely and righteously in choosing them, rather than their companions in idolatry and vice; it was equally wise and righteous to choose them from eternity, as at the very hour or moment preceding their regeneration.—This choice of them, however, was "to salvation," and it had not been made, because he foresaw they would be holy, nor yet with the purpose of leaving them unholy; but with the purpose of preparing them for heavenly happiness, "through the sanctification of the Spirit," and his new-creating energy beginning, carrying on, and perfecting their renewal to the divine image: and through their "belief of the truth," as here opposed to the lie of the man of sin. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 8—12. 1 Pet. 1:1—5,22—25.) For when they have been "quickened from the death of sin," he led them to believe the several truths of the word of God, especially those relating to the Person and Redemption of Christ, "the truth as it is in Jesus;" thus they were brought to receive him, and rely on him for pardon, righteousness, and grace; and so they received their title to heavenly felicity, and were trained up for the enjoyment of it. According to these purposes of God respecting them, he "had called them by the gospel," which Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy were sent to preach to them: this "came to them not in word only, but with the power of the Holy Ghost:" and their conversion by it both evidenced their "election of God," and was designed in order to "their obtaining the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ." (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, 1 Thes. 1:1—8. 2:13—16. 5:4—11.)—'How wisely and happily does the apostle unite the views of the grace of God and the duties of men! while he represents our choice to salvation in a light so worthy of God; since this salvation is still to be obtained, "through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth."' Doddridge.

V. 15. The apostle exhorted his beloved brethren, "by the mercies of God" bestowed on them, (Notes, Rom. 12:1,2.) to "stand fast," in the belief of those truths which they had heard from him, not only amidst the rage of persecutors, but against the artifices of deceivers: maintaining the instructions which he had given them, whether by word of mouth when with them, or by any verbal message, or by his former epistle. (Marg. Ref. 1 Thes. 3:6—13. 4:1—8.)—Doubtless the apostle's oral "traditions" were worthy of credence and obedience; but how should we, at this day, know any thing of them, except as they were written for our benefit? It is therefore a singular instance of the "deceivableness of unrighteousness" in "the man of sin," to attempt the support of his corrupt system, by a single word in that very chapter, which most fully exposes his devices. For oral traditions, of equal authority to the written word, being the rule of its interpretation, and committed to the keeping of the church, (that is, to the Romish clergy,) has been the grand support of popery for ages: and of this fundamental principle they have no better scriptural proof, than this single word, and one or two more of similar import! V. 16, 17. The apostle here addressed himself in prayer to "our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father," and he mentioned Christ first, in this most evident act of divine adoration: for "He and the Father are One," and, with the Holy Spirit the Comforter, that one God, "who had loved them, and given them everlasting consolation," a well-spring of comfort in his gospel, and by his Spirit in their hearts, which would endure to eternity, and of which they then enjoyed the earnest. (Marg. Ref. b, d. Note, John 4: 10—15, v. 14.) He had also given them a "good hope" well-grounded, of a good, a suitable, and sufficient portion and felicity, which originated from his mercy, and was evidenced and sanctioned by his grace in their hearts; and which produced the most beneficial effects in their lives, and supported them under their manifold trials. (Marg. Ref. e. Note

CHAPTER III.

The apostle requests the prayers of the Thessalonians, especially for the success of his ministry; expresses his confidence respecting them; and prays for them, 1—5. He charges them to censure and withdraw from disorderly walkers, who neglected their own business, and intermeddled in that of others; interspersing suitable arguments, directions, and exhortations, 6—15. He concludes with benedictions, 16—18.

FINALLY, brethren, [a]pray for us, that [b]the word of the Lord may [c]have free course, and [c]be glorified, [d]even as it is with you;

2 And that we may be [e]delivered from [f]unreasonable and wicked men: for all men have not faith.

3 But [g]the Lord is faithful, who shall [h]establish you, [i]and keep you from evil.

4 And [k]we have confidence in the Lord touching you, [l]that ye both do and will do the things which we command you.

5 And [m]the Lord direct your hearts [n]into the love of God, [o]and into [‡]the patient waiting for Christ. [Practical Observations.]

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers, to caution men against expectations not warranted by Scripture; but grounded on impressions, pretended revelations, and perversions of the word of God: for Satan makes immense use of these delusions, not only to unsettle men's minds, and fill them with needless apprehensions, but even to shake the foundations of their faith and hope, to draw them off from their duty, and to expose the gospel itself to ridicule and contempt, from scoffers of all descriptions. It is sufficient for us to know that our Lord will come, and will "gather all his saints" unto him: and we should be careful to be always ready for his coming; and to guard against delusions and presumption, in respect to the exact time of that great event. We know, however, that "the Scriptures cannot be broken:" the day of Christ could not come, till the predicted apostacy had taken place. These prophecies have now in a great measure received their completion, and confirm our assured belief of the truth of the Scripture: but, though "the son of perdition" has been revealed; though he has "opposed and exalted himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped;" and has spoken and acted, as if he were a deity upon earth, who had a right to be adored in the temple of God himself; though "the mystery of iniquity," after working long in secret, at length was brought to light; and "the lawless one" openly proclaimed his arrogance, enforced his presumptuous decrees, and supported his delusions, by the working of Satan, with lying miracles, and all kinds of impostures: yet, the Lord has not yet fully "destroyed him with the brightness of his coming;" and many more immensely important prophecies still remain to be fulfilled, before the end shall come.—But let us observe, that Satan does most mischief by those who, like Judas, profess themselves disciples and apostles, and sell Christ for money: these are emphatically "sons of perdition" and "men of sin." (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. P. O. 9—14. Matt. 21:12,13. P. O. 12—16. Rev. 18:11—19. P. O. 9—19.)—Avarice, pride, and ambition are always hateful; but they are most diabolical, when employed about spiritual things: and there have indeed been many Antichrists; yet no one has been so mischievous, as he "who seated himself in the temple of God."

V. 5—12. The world, in every age, has been replete with cheats and forgeries; yet none are so iniquitous or impious as those which some have called 'pious frauds;' and "Satan, transformed into an angel of light," (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) carries on his trade of destruction, by means of "lying signs" and miracles, or other species of "the deceivableness of unrighteousness," with more fatal effect than in any other character, or by any other engine. However, neither "the father of lies," nor any of his children, can go further, or proceed more rapidly, than the only wise God is pleased to permit. Every event takes place in the appointed season; and, after all the mysterious devices of iniquity which Satan or wicked men can frame, "the counsel of God shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" nay, one Anti christian power has often been employed, far besides his purpose, to stop the progress of another, still more pestiferous.—It will at last appear that none were deceived by any "energy of delusion," who were not at heart enemies to the truth and will of God, and who continued to "take pleasure in unrighteousness:" he is constantly permitting the devil to seduce persons of this character into the belief of some lie, by which they are held, as with fetters of iron, till they receive their merited condemnation. To avoid this fatal doom, men should take heed not to repress their convictions from love of sin, but to reverence the dictates and admonitions of conscience, by which God speaks to them emphatically, and with special application. They should pray earnestly for "the love of the truth," and for saving faith as inseparably connected with it: for many fall away and perish, who have "the knowledge of the truth;" but, "the love of the truth" "accompanies salvation," and never fails.—They should also use every means of obtaining that humble and spiritual mind, which is the best and the only security against every fatal delusion.

V. 13—17. If we now hate sin, and love the truth, "we are bound to thank God" for ourselves, and for each other. Many can well remember the time, when they despised or hated the doctrines of Scripture, and preferred soothing errors; nay, some of us seemed awfully to provoke God "to send us strong delusion to believe a lie;" and we should certainly have held it fast, if we had been left to ourselves. If then it be now otherwise, we may thankfully ascribe it to the love of God, to his special unmerited mercy and grace; who from the "beginning chose us unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth." But let none conclude themselves chosen and called, who are strangers to the "sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus." (Notes, 2 Tim. 1:9. 1 Pet. 1:1,2.) Let none place saving faith in any thing, but real efficacious "belief of the truth," as revealed in Scripture. This "belief of the truth" brings the sinner to rely on Christ, and thus to love and obey him; it is sealed by the Holy Spirit upon his heart, and it prepares him for the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ in heaven. Let us then stand fast in this doctrine of the apostles, and reject all spurious additions from every quarter: let us not hesitate to pray "to our Lord Jesus himself," as well as to our loving "God and Father;" that our interest in his "everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace" may be proved; not only by his "comforting our hearts," but by his "establishing us in every good word and work." Then we may, even in the most afflicted circumstances, look down with pity on the wealthiest of those, who have only the perishing consolations and hopes of this vain world; or the vain confidence which attends the contempt, neglect, or perversion of the gospel of God our Saviour.—For what are all the joys and comforts of this transient and unquiet scene, compared with "everlasting consolation," a joy which shall never be taken from us, never impaired, never lose its relish; but increase more and more to all eternity.

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—5. The apostle, drawing to a conclusion, requested the Thessalonians to pray for him and his fellow-labourers, and for success to their ministry; (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, Rom. 15:30,33. Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4.) "that the word of the Lord" Jesus, concerning him and his salvation, "might run," and be glorified, that it might be diffused by a rapid progress, from heart to heart, and from place to place, from one family to another, from one town or city to another, through divers nations: (Notes, John 1:35—46.) and that its excellent nature and effects might be manifested, in the conversion of numbers from idolatry and wickedness to the true worship of God; and in the holy lives, and the evident increasing fruitfulness, of professed Christians; even as the glory of the gospel had been most signally displayed among them. All this, and more seems implied, in the words, "may run and be glorified." (Marg. Ref. b—d. Notes, 1 Thes. 1:5—10. 2:13—16.)—He requested them also, to pray for the protection of him and the other preachers of the gospel, from the malice and violence of perverse and wicked men, such as the Jewish zealots were; whom no arguments could convince, no persuasion or kindness mollify: for their prejudices, the effect of their perverseness and wickedness, hurried them into all kinds of crimes, in order to oppose and destroy the apostle, and others who preached Christ to the Gentiles. The blind devotees of the pagan idolatry, whom the Jews stirred up to aid their persecutions, may also be intended. Notwithstanding the abundance of miracles, and the fulfilment of prophecies, which evinced the truth of the gospel; "all men had not faith" to believe it, that being the effect of a divine power upon the heart, which overcame the carnal pride, obstinacy, and enmity of fallen nature. Probably, some Judaizing Christians secretly concurred with more open enemies, in attempting the life of the apostle; and these false brethren, having no real faith in Christ, were also destitute of faithfulness in their professed friendship to him

6 Now we command you, brethren, [p]in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, [q]that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that [r]walketh disorderly, and not [s]after the tradition which he received of us.

7 For yourselves know [t]how ye ought to follow us: [u]for we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you;

8 Neither did we [x]eat any man's bread for naught; [y]but wrought with labour and travail, [z]night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you:

9 [a]Not because we have not power, but [b]to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow us.

10 For even [c]when we were with you, this we commanded you, [d]that if any would not work, neither should he eat.

11 For we hear that there are some which [e]walk among you disorderly, [f]working not at all but are busy bodies.

12 Now them that are such [g]we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, [h]that with quietness they work, and [i]eat their own bread.

13 But [k]ye, brethren, [l]be not weary in well-doing.

and his fellow-labourers; so that no confidence could be placed in them. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) But "the Lord is faithful" to his promises: (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 10:13. 1 Thes. 5:23—28.) and the apostle was fully persuaded, that the Thessalonians were true believers, whom God would establish in the faith, and defend against the devices of "the wicked one," and of evil men: and keep from the evil of sin, and all its fatal effects. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Notes, Matt. 6:13. 2 Tim. 4:16—18.) He had also confidence in the Lord respecting them, that he would give them grace, to incline and enable them, both at present and in future, to observe all the directions and commandments which he had given or should give them. He therefore prayed that God would guide and lead their hearts, into the comfortable experience of his love towards them, and into the exercise of love to him; (Notes, John 15:9—11. Jude 20,21.) and into the "patience of Christ," that patience which he exemplified, taught, required, and bestowed; even a resignation of soul under sufferings, meekness, and long-suffering under injuries, "patient continuance in well-doing," and a disposition calmly to wait for the Lord's time of deliverance. (Marg. Ref. l—n.) As it is the work of the Holy Spirit to direct and lead the soul into these holy tempers, and a consistent conduct; and as "the Lord" is here mentioned, distinct from God, and from Christ, it has been supposed, with some probability, that the apostle addressed this prayer personally to the Holy Spirit, "the Lord the Spirit," the third person in the adorable Trinity.

V. 6—9. The church at Thessalonica was in general deserving of high commendation; but the apostle had occasion to speak with authority and implied reproof, in one particular, of which he had before given some intimation. (Note, 1 Thes. 4:9—12.) He therefore "commanded," or "charged them, in the name," and as they valued the authority, favour, and glory, "of the Lord Jesus;" that they would "withdraw from every" one, called a Christian brother, who "walked disorderly," like a soldier that quitted his ranks or deserted his post. (Marg. Ref. p—s.) For they well knew, in what respects they ought to imitate him and his brethren; who had not behaved "disorderly among them," or done any thing inconsistent with the regularity of families, or of society. In particular, they had not lived at other people's expense, or in idleness: on the contrary, they had wrought, with very great labour and fatigue, to earn a maintenance for themselves; even during the night, when the day did not suffice for that, and for the exercise of their ministry also. Thus they avoided being "chargeable to any" person, that they might excite no prejudice against the gospel. Not that they had no right to a maintenance, or power to require one, by the rule of the gospel; but because, in their circumstances, they counted it necessary to endure much hardship, that they might become a proper example for their converts to imitate. (Marg. Ref. t—b. Notes, 1 Cor. 9:7—18. 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 12:11—13. Phil. 4:14—20. 1 Thes. 2:1—8.)—Withdraw. (6) 'It is taken from sailors, who by a bended course avoid a rock. To refrain from that, to which the eagerness of the mind carries one forward.' Erasmus. V. 10—12. Perhaps, the apostle had perceived a disposition, in some persons at Thessalonica, to make religion a pretence for indolence, and for subsisting on the hospitality and liberality of their brethren, without working at their own trades or occupations.—'How they might fall into this evil is easy to conceive. Persons all alive to God and his Christ, and knowing little of the deceitfulness of the heart, and the crafts of Satan, might find it irksome to attend to the concerns of this life. It was a fault indeed, and very dangerous if persisted in; but as it was soon corrected, in all probability, and in part occasioned by the strength of heavenly affections, one cannot be very severe in censuring it. ... It may be worth while for those who feel themselves much irritated against similar evils, attending on the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in our days, to consider, whether they do not exercise more candour toward the Thessalonians, and respect them as real Christians; while they scorn those who walk in their steps, as enthusiasts.' Jos. Milner, Ec. History.—The apostle, however, being fully aware of the consequences had when he was with them, commanded them not to maintain in idleness such as could work and would not, either by private or public charity; that, being left to endure the pinchings of hunger and want, they might be compelled to attend to their proper duty.—God gives every thing to man in the way of labour: and, in fact, in all cases, the industrious part of every community maintains the slothful. (Marg. Ref. c, d.) The words may indeed signify; 'If any man refuse to work, he ought by all means to live without food: but, if that be impossible, let him thence learn to consider how unreasonable and iniquitous idleness is:' by which a man, who cannot but consume, does nothing to replenish the stores which are thus exhausted. The expression was for substance a proverb among the Jews.—'They state it wrong, who render it, Let him not eat, who does not work: for none are more deserving of relief from others, than they who, through some just and necessary impediment, cannot labour, though they greatly desire it.' Beza. This venerable reformer here takes occasion to expose the mendicant monks and friars, as exactly answering the character described by St. Paul.—How far relieving vagrant beggars, of whose character or incapacity for labour we know nothing, can consist with this rule, is worthy of inquiry. Certainly the money might be almost always better employed. (Note, Luke 18: 35—43.)—Whatever rank men sustain, they are mere drones in the hive, unless they fill up the duties of their station for the common benefit. Christians therefore should not countenance such evident injustice: especially as this has always been one of the slanders raised against the professed worshippers of God. (Notes, Ex. 5:8,9,15—23. P. O. 1—9.)—The kindness required from believers, and to which they are propense as under the influence of holy love, often gives slothful persons an opportunity, on various pretences, to seek exemption from labour, by which they become useless and mischievous; they and their families are often reduced to great distress: debts are contracted which they cannot pay, and that bounty is diverted into a wrong channel, which should encourage the industrious poor, and support the sick and afflicted. The apostle therefore reminded his beloved children at Thessalonica of this rule: because he heard that there were some of these "disorderly" persons among them, who did not work at their own trades or callings, but expected to be maintained in idleness by their brethren. These would naturally contract a sauntering, gossiping habit, and would indulge a talkative, curious, and conceited temper: and, having much leisure, they would intermeddle with other men's concerns, to the disturbance of families, by exciting suspicions and jealousies among neighbours; and to the injury of men's characters. But the apostle commanded, and charged them, in the name of Christ, and as they would stand accepted before his tribunal, to cease from this officiousness and to attend to their own labour, with humility, modesty, contentment, and peaceable industry; that, thus subsisting on their own earnings, they might "eat their own bread," and not consume what properly belonged to others. (Marg. Ref. f, h, i. Notes, Ex. 20:15. Matt. 6:11.) The difficulty which modern missionaries, in most parts of the world, find in bringing those among whom they labour to habits of regular industry, the absolute necessity of doing this in order to any permanent success, and the very great impediments which indolence, as to regular daily employment, places in their way, well illustrates the necessity and importance of the apostle's charge in this particular. In all places, where missions have permanently succeeded, the converts, however indolent in mind or body before, have become industrious in some regular employment.

V. 13. As the bad use, which some individuals made of the liberality and hospitality of their brethren, tended to damp the ardour of Christian charity; the apostle thought it necessary to caution them against "growing weary in well-doing," in this or in any other instance. V. 14, 15. Should any one persist in disobeying the command, here given with so great solemnity and energy by the apostle, "to labour with quietness, and eat his own bread;" the other Christians were directed to "note him," by some token of full disapprobation; and every Christian was required to separate from his company or intimacy, that he might be put to shame, and brought to repentance. Thus the scandal would be prevented, and the credit of Christianity maintained. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, Matt. 18:15—17. Rom. 16:17—20. 1 Cor. 5:1—5,9—13. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. Tit. 3:10,11. 2 John 7—11.) Yet, they were by no means to show any ill-will to him, or do him any injury, as if he were "an enemy:" nay, they should even withdraw from him, with an especial purpose of doing him good; and in all respects persevere in seeking his real advantage by loving admonitions, considering him as a brother, though "overtaken in a fault." The apostle exhorts them to own them as Christian brethren, which they at present did not, who by excommunication are excluded from the church.' Whitby. It indeed is probable, that excommunication was not meant; but such tokens of general disapprobation, as came short of that solemn exclusion, which was reserved for the public censure of the church by its ministers on more scandalous offenders.—Thus the Corinthians were charged to excommunicate the incestuous person, and him only; though there were others, with whom they were forbidden even to eat. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5:1—5,9—13.)

V. 16. "The Lord Jesus," our great Peacemaker with the Father, and the great Author of all peace to men, was here addressed in prayer, to give the Thessalonians peace in their hearts and consciences, peace with each other, and peace with all men, at all times, and "by all means;" in his providence, by his grace, through the labours of his ministers, and their own mutual endeavours, and by their prayers for each other: and that he would be with them all, as the Author of comfort and holiness to their souls. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. 9:6,7. 26:3,4. John 14:27,28. Eph. 2:11—18. Phil. 4:4—7. 1 Thes. 5:23—28. Heb. 7:1—3. 13:20,21.)

V. 17. It is probable, that the apostle's method of writing by an amanuensis, gave occasion to some counterfeit epistles to be written in his name: he therefore subscribed the salutation with his own hand, as "the token in every epistle," that it came from him.—It is not unlikely, that he dictated his epistles, while labouring at his trade as a tent-maker.

V. 18. Notes, Rom. 16:16—24, v. 24. 2 Cor. 13:11—14.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. The success of the gospel is as really promoted by fervent prayer, as by faithful preaching.—All, in whose conversion it has "been glorified," should labour to honour it in their lives; and they should desire and pray constantly and fervently, that it "may have free course, and be glorified," in the same manner all over the earth. They ought also to beseech the Lord to protect his faithful ministers against those "unreasonable and wicked men," who may every where be met with, even among professed Christians, and who are equally destitute of faith and faithfulness; that they may not be discouraged by their most virulent or determined opposition. Our whole dependence, however, must be upon the faithfulness of God to his promises, who will surely establish those who humbly rely on him by obedient faith, and preserve them from every fatal snare, "deliver them from every evil work, from evil" of all kinds, and from the evil one; "and preserve them to his heavenly kingdom." If, by his special grace we have that faith which multitudes have not, our obligations to him are immense; and we should earnestly apply to him to incline and enable us, perseveringly and without reserve, to obey all his commands; and that "the Lord the Spirit" may "direct our hearts into the love of God and the patience of Christ," and persevering diligence in every good work. (Note, Jude 20,21.)

V. 6—18. It is of great importance to the credit and success of the gospel, that the injunctions of the apostles be observed; and that believers "withdraw from every brother who walketh disorderly," and habitually neglects or violates the precepts of Scripture. Pious men are often betrayed into a disregard to this rule, through humility and tenderness; by which means the misconduct of one professed believer turns to the scandal of his profession, and he himself is soothed into carnal security, by an ill-judged and unkind lenity.—Whatever difficulties occur respecting public discipline; believers of every denomination might agree, in separating from disorderly walkers, with proper admonitions and expostulations; that thus being "put to shame" they might be brought to repentance. This would be so far from "counting them as enemies," that it would be the wisest exercise of brotherly love.—It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers, to show the tendency of their doctrine in their own conduct, that the people may perceive "how they ought to imitate them." It is not indeed required, or generally expected, that they should "labour and toil, night and day, to avoid being chargeable" to the people: for they "that preach the gospel, have a right to live of the gospel;" and, if faithful and diligent in their work, they by no means "eat any man's bread for naught." Yet they should be very careful to avoid every appearance of selfishness, indolence, or an encroaching spirit; and they must often give up their own interest, indulgence, and inclination, to make themselves an example to the people, and to give energy to their instructions.—A slothful man is a scandal to any society, but most of all to a religious society. It would be deemed rigorous, should we enforce the apostle's rule, "that if any willeth not to work, neither shall he eat:" yet, in fact, it is founded in equity and love. It is injustice to the indigent, the weak, and the industrious, when the bounty of their brethren is wasted on the indolent and extravagant. The greatest kindness which can be shown to the latter, is to constrain them, if possible, "to labour, working with their own hands the thing which is good:" this alone can preserve them from mischief, temptation, and misery. (Note, Eph. 4:28.) None can "eat their own bread," who are not willing, in some way, to labour for it. Those who neglect their own business, become "busy-bodies," officious intermeddlers, talebearers, and disturbers of the peace of families, churches, and communities: for 'Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do.' Persons of this description ought therefore to be discountenanced, rebuked, and "commanded from the Lord Jesus, with quietness to labour and eat their own bread;" and, if they refuse to do this, they should be censured, noted, and shunned by all believers, till brought to repentance.—No abuses, however, of this or any other kind, should make us "weary of well-doing," check our bounty to proper objects, or our genuine good-will to the most unworthy.—While we use every means of peace, in our private or public capacity; we must still pray to "the Lord of peace," "to give us peace always, and by all means:" and that he would be with us, and confer his grace on us and all our brethren.

THE

FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TIMOTHY.

THE time when this Epistle was written, constitutes the principal difficulty respecting it. It was long the general opinion, that the apostle wrote it soon after he was driven from Ephesus, on account of the tumult excited by Demetrius and his craftsmen. (Acts 19: 21—40. 20:1.) But several very learned and respectable men have, in modern times, started objections against this opinion, which they think insurmountable.—There is no reasonable doubt, that the second Epistle to the Corinthians was written, during the apostle's abode in Macedonia, after he came thither from Ephesus. But it is evident that Timothy was with him when he wrote that epistle; for his name is inserted in the superscription. (2 Cor. 1:1. Note, 2 Cor. 2:12,13.)—How then, say they, could he have been left at Ephesus, and entreated to abide there? (1:3.) 'And as to the only solution of the difficulty, which can be thought of, viz. that Timothy might follow . . . so soon after as to be with the apostle in Macedonia, when he wrote his epistle to the Corinthians; that supposition is inconsistent with the terms and tenor of the epistle throughout. For the writer speaks uniformly of his intention to return to Timothy at Ephesus; and not of his expecting Timothy to come to him in Macedonia. (3:14,15. 4:13.)—Therefore I concur with Bishop Pearson, in placing the date of the epistle, and the history referred to in it, at a period subsequent to St. Paul's first imprisonment, and consequently subsequent to the era, up to which the Acts of the Apostles bring his history.' Paley. This is a fair statement of the main objection; though some things of inferior moment will require a little attention. It may, however, be questioned, whether the conclusion here deduced, does not lie open to still more insuperable objections. Some regard may be due to the total silence of the Scripture, as to any subsequent visit of the apostle to Ephesus, and his departure thence to Macedonia.—It is indeed allowed, that during his imprisonment at Rome, he mentions in his epistles a purpose of visiting several places in the eastern regions. (Phil. 2:24. Philem. 22. Heb. 13:19,23.) And in his second epistle to Timothy, it appears, that he had been at several places in the neighbourhood of Ephesus. Still, however, there is no intimation that he visited Ephesus. He observes, in the close of this epistle, that he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus; which may imply, that he had not gone thither himself.—Indeed, whether it be allowed, according to historical records, which are not very satisfactory, that he hastened from Crete to Rome, hearing accounts which induced him to think that his presence there was necessary; or whether his persecutors seized on him, and conveyed him to Rome, in an unexpected manner; it seems evident that he was hurried out of these regions, before he had time to accomplish his purposes in the manner which he wished to do. (Notes, 2 Tim. 4:12—20.) It might also be brought as an objection to this opinion, that Timothy, after the conclusion of St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, must, on any computation, have been above thirty years of age; and though, at that time of life, the exhortation to flee youthful lusts might not be unseasonable; (2 Tim. 2:22.) yet the caution, "Let no man despise thy youth," (4:12.) seems not so consistent.—But the grand difficulty arises from the words of the apostle to the Ephesian elders at Miletus: "And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more." It is evident, that the persons present understood this, not as a conjecture, or as 'a desponding inference,' but as a prediction. When the apostle perceived the overwhelming sorrow, which it had excited in them, he neither retracted nor qualified it: and it seems unquestionable that the historian records it as a prophecy. (Notes, Acts 20:25—27,36—38.) The words 'Ye all,' &c.—confine the interpretation to the persons present: the prediction therefore would be exactly fulfilled, though the apostle visited many places in that neighbourhood; nay, though he purposed (which is not likely) to visit Ephesus, provided he did not actually go thither, or meet any of the elders to whom he gave the charge at Miletus.—It can hardly be supposed, that after an absence of perhaps rather more than ten years, the apostle revisiting Ephesus, found, that all the elders whom he had addressed at Miletus were dead. But, except on this very improbable supposition, or on that of the words before adduced being a mere conjecture, in which the event proved the apostle to have been mistaken; we must adhere to the old opinion, that this epistle was written immediately after the apostle had left Ephesus to go into Macedonia: because it is, on every other supposition, almost, if not absolutely certain, that he never after left Ephesus to go into Macedonia. But let us next consider, whether the objections above so cogently stated, against the ancient opinion, may not be satisfactorily answered.—The apostle must have spent some considerable time in Macedonia, after he left Ephesus, and before he went to Corinth: for "he went over those parts, and gave them much exhortation." (Acts 20:2.) Now, it is not in the least improbable, that unforeseen circumstances might induce Timothy to leave Ephesus, sooner than either he or the apostle had intended. The virulence of the persecutors might drive him thence; or he might need some counsel and instruction, in respect of the false teachers, or on some special points, which had occurred to him concerning the state of the church.—Various circumstances, indeed, might render it inexpedient for him to continue at Ephesus, according to the plan at first formed. On the other hand, it is probable, the apostle wrote this epistle as soon as he arrived in Macedonia; and at that time he might fully purpose, and confidently hope, to go to Timothy at Ephesus, and yet be disappointed.—Thus, he had "once and again," purposed to return to Thessalonica: "but Satan hindered him." (1 Thes. 2:18.) Thus he had seen cause to alter his plan, in respect of going to Corinth, even after he had given some intimations of it. (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:15—20.)—It may not improbably be conjectured, that the apostle, when he left Ephesus, expected that Timothy would abide there till he had accomplished his business in Macedonia and Achaia; and that he should be enabled to go to him at Ephesus; as he took his voyage to Jerusalem with the contributions of the churches: but, having been induced, by the malicious designs of the Jews, to go from Corinth through Macedonia; so much time had elapsed, that he found it necessary to sail past Ephesus, lest he should not arrive at Jerusalem by the feast of Pentecost. This might derange one part of his plan; and the departure of Timothy from Ephesus would defeat another. (Notes, Acts 20:1—6,13—16.)—As the difficulties on this side seem to me far less than those on the other, I adhere, though with diffidence, to the ancient opinion, and shall comment on the epistle accordingly.—The history, in the Acts of the Apostles, implies, that Timothy continued with the apostle, during his progress through Macedonia, and his abode at Corinth: and that he returned with him through Macedonia into Asia. But Timothy is not afterwards mentioned, as accompanying the apostle, either to Jerusalem, or in his subsequent imprisonment at Cesarea, or in his voyage to Rome: and it is probable, that he abode in Asia; and, accompanying the elders of Ephesus, when they parted from the apostles, he settled at that city for some years; according to the ancient records of the church concerning him.—But when four years or nearly had passed, it seems that he went to the apostle at Rome, and was imprisoned with him, but was soon set at liberty, and sent to Philippi. (Phil. 2:19. Heb. 13:23.)—In respect to Timothy, it is sufficient to refer to the account before given of his appointment to be St. Paul's companion in travel. (Notes, Acts 16:1—5.) Having been trained up under the apostle's immediate care, he imbibed in an extraordinary degree his spirit and principles, and was peculiarly beloved by him. The apostle, when suddenly driven from Ephesus, had left Timothy behind him to settle the concerns of that church, in the best manner he could; and wrote this epistle to him for his direction in so doing.—Whether the above conjecture (for we have no authentic records to direct us) of Timothy's return to Ephesus and residence there, be well grounded, or not; these directions would not be in vain: for the substance of them would be equally applicable in any other church, to which he might be sent, or in which he might have resided.—Indeed, it does not appear, that the apostle intended to give Timothy instructions exclusively, or even principally, respecting the Ephesian church but rather general counsels for his conduct in the churches of Christ; and for that of all others, when called to act in similar circumstances.—'Having done the work for which he was bid to stay at Ephesus, he might go on to other places, doing the work of an Evangelist, and settling ordinary church-governors, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, where they were wanting, and doing all other things mentioned in this epistle, as things to be performed in the church of God.' Whitby.—The epistle contains cautions against false teachers; directions concerning the worship of God, and the behaviour of believers: the character and conduct to be required in bishops and deacons, and their families; exhortations to Timothy, concerning his private and public behaviour, especially in ordaining ministers, censuring offenders, and settling the other affairs of the church: admonitions against several sins and temptations; solemn charges to faithfulness, and various doctrinal and practical counsels and instructions interwoven with them. This, and the two following epistles, are peculiarly replete with instruction to ministers; and should be continually studied, and meditated on, by all who bear that sacred character, or are preparing for the good work of the ministry.—The postscript dates the epistle from Laodicea; but it is almost certain that the apostle had never visited that city when he wrote this epistle. (Col. 2:1.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle addresses Timothy, 1, 2; reminds him for what purpose he was left at Ephesus, 3, 4; shows that "the end of the commandment is love, from a pure heart, a good conscience, and unfeigned faith," 5; from which some having swerved, in attempting to preach the law had perverted it, 6, 7. The law is good; but is intended to condemn transgressors, 8—10; which accords with the gospel also, 11. With deep humility and thankfulness, the apostle speaks of his own conversion, and the encouragement given by it to sinners in every age; and ascribes glory to God, 12—17. He charges Timothy to maintain faith and a good conscience; and mentions some, who had renounced the truth, and whom he had delivered unto Satan, 18—20.

3 As I besought thee to abide still [h]at Ephesus, [i]when I went into Macedonia, that thou mightest [k]charge some that they teach no other doctrine, 4 Neither give heed [l]to fables and [m]endless genealogies, which minister [n]questions, rather than [o]godly edifying which is in faith: so do.

5 Now [p]the end of the commandment is [q]charity, out of [r]a pure heart, and of [s]a good conscience, and of [t]faith unfeigned:

6 [u]From which some having [v]swerved, have [x]turned aside unto vain jangling;

7 Desiring [y]to be teachers of the law, [z]understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm.

8 But we know that [a]the law is good, if a man use it [b]lawfully;

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. In this address, Paul called himself "an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the commandment of God our Saviour;" by which, in this connexion, the Person of the Father seems intended, as purposing salvation for sinners, forming the plan of it, and giving his own Son to be in human nature their Saviour: but the Lord Jesus was joined in granting this commission, as being one with the Father, in essence, authority, and counsel. The apostle called "the Lord Jesus our Hope;" as all his hope of salvation and eternal happiness was fixed upon the Person, righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Christ. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, Rom. 5:1—5. 15:8—13. Eph. 1:9—14. Col. 1:25—27. 1 Pet. 1:3—5,17—21.) He also addressed Timothy as his "own son" in the faith, or his genuine son. In all probability he was the instrument of Timothy's conversion: he had, as it were, educated him in the gospel; and Timothy reverenced him, and served with him in his ministry as a dutiful son with a loving father. (Notes, Acts 16:1—3. Phil. 2:19—23.) From the exuberance of his love to Timothy, he added the word "mercy" to his usual salutation; or perhaps because his peculiar trials and services would require peculiar consolations, from the compassion and mercy of the Lord towards him. (Marg. Ref. e—g.)—God our Saviour. (1) 'The Father saves us, as reconciled to him in the Son; and the Son saves us, as reconciled in his flesh.' Beza. (Notes, Is. 12:1,2. Tit. 2:9,10. 3:4—7.)

V. 3, 4. The apostle left Timothy at Ephesus, when he went thence into Macedonia; (Preface;) that he might solemnly and constantly charge certain persons to teach no other doctrines than what he had done. (Marg. Ref. k. Note, Gal. 1:6—10.) The Judaizers would be sure to take the opportunity of St. Paul's absence, to propagate their tenets; and he knew them to be zealous for the traditions and fabulous pretences of the elders and Pharisees, as well as for the Mosaic law. But the Ephesians must be warned not to take notice of such fables; or of their genealogies, which related to their descent from Abraham, or the patriarchs, or from Aaron, or David, by which they imagined themselves entitled to peculiar privileges. These genealogies led to endless intricacies and perplexities, and to many difficult questions and useless controversies; and they rather induced a carnal presumption and a self-confident temper; than led to any improvement in godliness and holiness of heart and life; which could only be maintained and increased by faith in the truth and promises of God, through Jesus Christ. This charge therefore was to be steadfastly observed by him. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, Col. 2:5—23.)—Some imagine, that "endless genealogies" denote the extravagant and indeed unintelligible notions of the Gnostics and other heretics, about the origin of the world; and various fictions and vain imaginations: (Note, Tit. 3:9.) but the context seems to determine in favour of the interpretation before given; and it may well be questioned, whether any of these heretics had, at so early a period, openly propagated their incoherent and profane jargon.—Godly edifying. (4) Or "Edification of God;" 'because it hath God for its Object and End, as tending to the true knowledge and right worship of God: it is efficiently from him, ... and tendeth highly to his glory.' Whitby.

V. 5. The word rendered "commandment," is by some explained of the moral law, the scope and substance of which is "charity," or "love," towards God and man. Others understand it to mean the revelation of God to men, by the gospel; the end of which is to restore fallen sinners to the love required by the law: and this better suits the context. But others explain it of "the charge" given to Timothy by the apostle; and this seems to be the right interpretation, for thus it had reference both to the law as the rule of duty, and to the grand design of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) The "charity," or love, here spoken of, must arise out of "a pure heart," the soul having been cleansed by renewing grace, from the love and pollution of sin, and from carnal enmity and selfishness; (Marg. Ref. r. Note, 1 Pet. 1:22—25.) and a "good conscience;" or one well informed concerning the will of God, and made tender and active by divine grace, as well as purged from guilt by the blood of Christ; that so the possessor might be influenced to act conscientiously in his whole conduct. (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, Acts 24:10—21, v. 16. 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12. Heb. 9:11—14. 13:18,19, v. 18. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.) It must also come from "unfeigned faith," or a sincere belief of divine testimony, the truths revealed in the sacred Scripture; and a reliance on Christ, and the promises of God through him. This "faith, working by love," "purifying the heart," and producing "a good conscience," constituted the substance of what the apostle ordered Timothy to give in charge to the Ephesian teachers; because it comprised the grand essentials of evangelical religion. The several characteristics of love, here given, admirably distinguish it from the spurious charity which is, in modern time, the favourite virtue of the world.—It is not the natural growth of the human heart, but exists only in a heart purified by divine grace. It grows out of "a good conscience," and is inseparable from it; not sacrificing truth and common sense, as well as conscience, to the phantom of candour and liberality: it springs from faith, instead of being independent of it and superseding it. (Notes, 1 Cor. 13: Gal. 5:1—6,22—26.)

V. 6, 7. From this love, and purity, and conscientiousness, some professed Christians had swerved, or deviated, out of zeal for external distinctions, legal observances, and human traditions. Thus they turned aside from the faith also, and got engaged in vain janglings, and angry controversies, about doubtful points of small consequence. (Marg. Ref. u, x.) For they were desirous of being "teachers or doctors of the law;" and to exercise that office among Christians, in order to acquire a reputation for learning, and to be called Rabbi: (Notes, Matt. 23:5—10.) but they "neither understood what they said, nor whereof they affirmed," with full and unqualified confidence. They declaimed, in a perplexed and inconclusive manner, upon general topics; not understanding the spiritual nature and uses of the moral law, which they attempted to explain; nor the typical import of those abrogated ceremonies which they enforced. good" in itself, or for its intended purposes, provided "a man used it lawfully," according to its real import, and the design of the great Lawgiver. The moral law "is holy, just, and good," resulting from the nature of God and man, and men's relations to him and to each other. Even the ceremonial law had a relative goodness, for the time, as typical of Christ and the gospel: and the entire Mosaic dispensation was good; as separating Israel from other nations, affording them the means of grace, and introducing Christianity. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Deut. 32:4. Rom. 7:7—12. Gal. 3:19—22.) But to enforce the Mosaic law on Christians; or to teach them to depend on their own obedience to any part of it for justification, was contrary to the real meaning of the law itself and the intention of the Lawgiver. It was evident, even from the books of Moses, when properly understood, that "Christ was the End of the law for righteousness to every believer;" and that the strict demands and awful sanction of the law itself, were intended to show the Israelites, that they could not be justified by it, but must live by faith in the promised Saviour. (Notes, Rom. 10:1—4. Gal. 5:1—6.) As, therefore, believers were righteous persons in God's appointed way, both as to their justified state and obedient conduct, the law was not enacted against them. Indeed laws in general were not made to coerce the well-disposed subject, but the ill-affected: and the case was the same in respect of the divine law. Its design (as far as it is penal) is to restrain and condemn the wicked: not to hold the humble in servile bondage by its curse; though its precept will be, of course, the rule of their conduct and the standard of their duty.—"The law is not made against the righteous." This seems a fair translation, and certainly is the meaning of the words.—"If a man use it lawfully;" 'that is,' says Theodoret, 'if he comply with the scope of it, which is to bring him to Christ. . . . The law was not made to condemn the just man: for against such there is no law condemning them; (Gal. 5: 23.) but it lies against the lawless to condemn them.' Whitby.—After the general terms of "lawless and disobedient," which relate to the disregard and contempt of God's commandments, as manifested in the outward conduct; the apostle mentions the "ungodly and sinners," or those who neglect their duties to God and their neighbours; and "unholy and profane," which may refer to the gross sensuality and debauchery of multitudes, and that daring impiety commonly connected with it. He then enumerates some particular crimes of the most atrocious nature. (Marg. Ref. c—o.) Doubtless numerous instances of each were found among the Gentiles, and some perhaps among the bigoted Jews, who depended on the law, or on some law, and yet scandalously broke their own rule of conduct. (Rom. 2:12—29.) "Men-stealers," are inserted among these daring criminals, against whom the law of God directed its awful curses. (Note, Ex. 21:15—17.) These were persons who kidnapped men to sell them for slaves: and this practice seems inseparable from the other iniquities and oppressions of slavery; nor can a slave-dealer by any means keep free from this atrocious criminality, if indeed 'the receiver be as bad as the thief.'—'They who make war for the inhuman purpose of selling the vanquished for slaves, as is the practice among African princes, are really man-stealers. And they who, like African traders, encourage their unchristian traffic, by purchasing that which they know to be thus unjustly acquired, are partakers in their crimes. Macknight. The clause should have been, 'know, or have reason to suspect.' This is the only species of theft which is punishable with death, by the law of God. (Ex. 21:16.)—The apostle did not mean, that none but persons of so infamous a character lay under "the curse of the law;" but that it was directed against all other practices, which were "contrary to sound doctrine," or the salutary nature and tendency of the Christian revelation (Marg. Ref. p. Note, Tit. 2:1, t.) According to this, every impenitent sinner, every man who allowed himself in the practice of any known transgression, remained under the covenant and curse of the law. This accorded to "the gospel of the glory of the blessed God," (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:3—6.) as intrusted to the apostle, by which he displayed all his perfections in the most honourable and harmonious manner, by saving believers from their sins, as well as from wrath: (Note, Rom. 2:12—16.) for, being "the blessed God," the Perfection and Source of felicity, as well as of holiness, he had devised to render fallen men partakers of his happiness, by renewing them to the participation of his holiness. V. 12—14. The consideration, that he "had been intrusted with the gospel of the glory of the blessed God," awakened in the apostle's mind humble and admiring gratitude, and he burst forth into adoring thanks to Christ Jesus, for his distinguished mercy to him; both by conferring on him abundantly miraculous powers; and by enduing him richly with the courage, resolution, and patience of faith, hope, and love. (Notes, 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13.) Thus he had "enabled him" and qualified him for this honourable service and had "counted him faithful," a proper person to be employed as his steward and ambassador; which he had evinced "by putting him into the ministry," and owning him as his apostle. This was, in all respects, most astonishing grace; seeing he had before been a most daring "blasphemer" of his name, and had compelled others to blaspheme it; he had furiously persecuted Christ's disciples, and most injuriously haled them to prison, with bitter sarcasms and reproaches, and sought to put them to death, from entire enmity to the name and cause of their Lord! (Marg. Ref. u—a. Notes, Acts 9:1—6. 26:9—11.) But, though his conduct had been so aggravated, he "had obtained mercy:" for his sins were not absolutely unpardonable, because he had perpetrated them "ignorantly in unbelief;" whereas, if his knowledge had been greater, and if his malice had been exerted against the full convictions of his own conscience, he would have been given up to final impenitence. His ignorance and unbelief, indeed, amidst such abundant means of information and conviction, were the result of a self-sufficient, obstinate, and contemptuous prejudice against the truth; yet he "verily thought that he ought to do many things against the name of Jesus," and was in no sense convinced that he was the Messiah: but there were others, who were hurried on by malice, ambition, and selfishness, to act in direct opposition to the dictates of their own consciences, and thus to "sin against the Holy Spirit;" by maliciously ascribing his undeniable operations to human imposture, or satanical influence. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Matt. 12:31,32. Heb. 6:4—6. 10:26—31. 1 John 5:16—18.)—It is remarkable, that many persons have supposed

Paul's proud and willful ignorance, and his consequent unbelief, (two sins, in themselves deserving of divine wrath, though in his circumstances they just preserved him from the unpardonable sin,) to have been a kind of meritorious cause of his obtaining mercy; especially when joined with his sincerity in opposing the gospel! (Note, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12.) They imagine that, in some manner or measure, he deserved mercy more than any who are left to perish. This they must mean, if they mean any thing to the purpose; for, though his guilt might be less than that of some Jews, who, sinning against clearer light and with more deliberate malice, were given up to final obduracy; yet, those who maintain the doctrine of salvation by grace suppose, that many perish in their sins, whose criminality is far less than his was: that he might most justly have thus been left to perish; and that no reason can by us be assigned for his salvation in preference to others, who had not committed the sin against the Holy Spirit, except the sovereign grace of God, "who hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will be hardeneth;" and the other reason which the apostle himself next assigns, namely, "the praise of the glory of his grace." (Notes, Rom. 5:20,21. 9:15—23. Eph. 1:3—8.) For he evidently confesses that he should have righteously perished, if the Lord had dealt with him according to strict justice; nay, if his grace and mercy had not been "exceedingly abundant," beyond all expectation, estimation, or conception; not only, in that he was ready to forgive, bless, and employ him, when he repented, believed, and was prepared for obedience; but, "in quickening him when dead in sin," and so working faith and love to Jesus Christ in his heart, that he might be "found in him and be partaker of his righteousness." "'Faith and love,' which by the influence of his Spirit, were implanted in my heart.' Doddridge. (Notes, Eph. 2:1—10. Phil. 3:8—11.)

V. 15, 16. The conversion, justification, and reconciliation of so virulent a persecutor, who "was exceedingly mad against" the disciples of Jesus, might be considered as a most striking illustration of the nature of the gospel, and of the abundant riches of the mercy of God in Christ Jesus. It is indeed "a faithful saying" authenticated by every evidence which proves Christianity to be "the word of God, who cannot lie;" and it was "worthy to be received," with humble and thankful faith and cordial affection, by men of all nations and descriptions; as all are sinners, and none can be saved in any other way, and as none are excluded from salvation who seek it in this way; (Notes, John 6:36—40. Acts 4:5—12, v. 12.) "that Jesus," Emmanuel, the Son of God, the Messiah, "came into the world to save sinners," voluntarily, with this express design, and for this single purpose. (Marg. Ref. g—i.) "The Word," who "was God and was with God," the Creator and upholder of all worlds, the Lord of all creatures, "became flesh," that he might be "the second Adam," the surety of the new covenant, to "fulfil all righteousness," and to offer an infinitely valuable atonement for sin, in order that, being risen and ascended, he might be an advocate and high-priest, and reign over all worlds for the benefit of his church and of mankind. "To save sinners," of every people and character, from condemnation, sin, Satan, the world, and death, even all, without exception, who came to him by faith for this salvation, to "the praise of the glory of God," was, and is the only end proposed in this grand and most wonderful transaction. Of these sinners, Paul judged himself "the chief;" the greatest enemy of Christ, and the most deserving of divine vengeance, of all who ever were, or would be, saved by him. (Marg. Ref. k.)—This seems the purport of the expression: but, it is not impossible, that he supposed his actual crimes to be so numerous and enormous, that his guilt even exceeded that of those who had sinned more entirely against their own convictions, and so had been given up to final impenitency. Instead of imagining, that there was something meritorious in his blind and obstinate sincerity, (as some have maintained in direct opposition to his own statement!) he considered himself as one selected on purpose, because he was more guilty than any other person in the world, (those only excepted, who had committed the unpardonable sin, if even they were excepted,) "that in him first," or the chief sinner, "Jesus Christ might exhibit," with the greatest lustre imaginable, that degree in which he can bear with and pardon his most violent and enraged enemies, and the most atrociously criminal of mankind. That so it might stand upon record to the end of time for the encouragement of all others, in every age and nation, who believe in Christ, and rely on his merits and grace, for the pardon of their sins, and the gift of eternal life; to prevent their being bowed down in discouragement by a retrospective view of the number, nature, and heinousness of their crimes. V. 17. Some expositors suppose this doxology to be addressed personally to Christ as God, because the apostle had before been speaking of him: but it seems rather to be addressed to the Godhead, without distinction of persons. "The Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit," three Persons in the Unity of the Godhead, "the God of Salvation," constitute the Object of all our worship, which person soever we immediately address. To God, as "the King eternal," in every age and under every dispensation, the universal, and everlasting, invisible Sovereign, the inexhaustible Source of all wisdom, he ascribed all the glory of his conversion, salvation, endowments for service, faithfulness, and usefulness; and he desired earnestly, that God might be honoured, in all his perfections and wonderful works, by all rational creatures, for ever and ever. Amen. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 6:13—16. John 1:18. Jude 22—25.)

V. 18—20. The apostle here referred to what he had before spoken. (Notes, 5,8—11, v. 11.) The trust, committed to him by Jesus Christ, as his apostle, he "had committed to his son Timothy." He was encouraged to repose so great confidence in him, not only by what he knew of his principles and character; but by entertaining large hopes of him "according to certain prophecies," which inspired persons had uttered concerning him, before his appointment to the ministry; and he expected, that by meditating upon them, he should be animated and instructed, in "warring a good warfare," or rather, "the good warfare;" the truly beneficial and honourable warfare, of a faithful follower and minister of Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. x—a. Notes, 6:11,12. Eph. 6:10—20. 2 Tim. 2:3—7. 4:6—8.) This must be done by maintaining and insisting on, fully and clearly, both the faith of the gospel or its doctrines as uncorrupted and unmutilated, and a good conscience or a universally conscientious conduct. These Timothy must be careful to connect, both in his own example and in his preaching: for some professed Christians, having neglected to maintain and insist on a good conscience; had, after a time, renounced the faith also, and made shipwreck of their whole religion, either by a total apostacy from their profession, or by heretical corruptions of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) Of this number were Hymeneus and Alexander, with whom Timothy had doubtless been acquainted. (Notes, Acts 19:32—41. 2 Tim. 2:14—19. 4:14, 15.) These the apostle had found it needful openly to excommunicate, and cast out of the church, into the visible kingdom of Satan; that they might be instructed by this discipline, "not to blaspheme" Christ, or disgrace his gospel

CHAPTER II.

The apostle enjoins prayers, and thanksgivings, to be made for all men; especially for kings and rulers to "God our Saviour, who is willing that all should be saved," 1—4. There is "one God, and one Mediator, Jesus Christ, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," 5, 6. He declares his appointment, as the teacher of the Gentiles, 7; gives directions concerning prayer, and the modest apparel of women, 8—10; prohibits them to teach, and requires them to be in subjection, 11, 12; as the man was first created and the woman was first seduced into sin, 13, 14. A promise concerning child-bearing, 15.

I ᵃEXHORT therefore, that, ᵃfirst of all, ᵇsupplications, prayers, intercessions, ᶜ*and* giving of thanks be made for ᵈall men:

2 For ᵉkings, and ᶠ*for* all that are in ᶠauthority; ᵍthat we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in ʰall godliness and honesty.

3 For ⁱthis is good and acceptable in the sight of ᵏGod our Saviour;

4 Who ˡwill have all men to be saved, ᵐand to come unto ⁿthe knowledge of the truth.

5 For there is ᵒone God, ᵖand one Mediator between God and men, ᵍthe Man Christ Jesus;

6 Who ʳgave himself a ransom for all, ˢto be testified ᵗin due time.

by their impious tenets. It is generally supposed, that some severe correction was miraculously inflicted on them, attending their exclusion from the communion of the church, which would tend to make them sensible of their guilt and danger, and be subservient to the charitable design of bringing them to repentance. (Marg. Ref. f—k. Notes, 1 Cor. 4:18—21. 5:1—5. 2 Cor. 13:1—4,7—10.) It does not, however, appear that either of them was thus recovered.—It has often been justly observed, that these severe censures, which the apostle inflicted on those, who had once been professors or ministers of Christianity, and publicly recorded with their names annexed; constitute a most conclusive proof, that he had no dread least they should be provoked to disclose any secret, or give information of evil practices, which they had witnessed among Christians. His conduct implied a public challenge to them, in this respect; and was the genuine expression of conscious integrity, and the courage which springs from it.—Some think, that Timothy was chosen to the ministry, by the prophecies respecting him; (18) and that this was the way in which the pastors and teachers in the newly planted churches, were usually selected: but this opinion, as to the general plan, does not appear to be supported by sufficient proof.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. Apostles themselves, as well as the most eminent ministers in every age, who have evidently been commissioned by "God our Saviour, and the Lord Jesus Christ," have had no other ground of hope, as to the salvation of their own souls, than what they possessed in common with their meanest brethren. In some respects they have needed, and "do need grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and our Lord Jesus," more than others do: their temptations, trials, and difficulties, being greater; having the same evil nature with other men, and no more wisdom or strength, in themselves, than they: and even their most faithful and useful services needing mercy, in order to the acceptance of them, as well as grace, and sufficiency to perform them. (Note, John 1:16.) He, however, who appointed them, has always been ready to uphold and help them; and his strength is perfected in their wickedness. (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.)—It is also of the greatest importance, for those to whom such services belong, to charge with all solemnity and authority curious and conceited persons, to "preach no other doctrine" than that of the Scriptures: for Satan makes immense use of false teachers, to sow tares in the Lord's field, to multiply hypocrites, to deceive souls, to disturb the peace of the church, to excite questions and contentions; and in short to engage men in any thing, which may take them off from 'godly edifying which is in faith."

V. 5—11. The design of the gospel is not answered by speculation, and solving abstract questions, or "giving heed to fables and endless" disputation: but when sinners, through "repentance towards God and faith towards Christ Jesus," are brought to the habitual exercise of holy "love, out of a pure heart, a good conscience, and faith unfeigned."—All doctrines, sacraments, and forms are just so far beneficial to us, as they are useful in producing this effect in our hearts and lives: and all that faith is dead, which does not thus influence men to love God and each other, in a practical and holy manner. But alas! in how many ways do men swerve from this plain and simple statement of the truth, and "turn aside unto vain jangling!" Many, called Christian ministers, "desire to be teachers of the law, knowing neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm:" and thus a few fragments of morality are substituted, in the place of the holy law, and the blessed "gospel of God our Saviour!" Others know not, or acknowledge not, that the "law is good when used lawfully;" and they declaim in so general a manner against the law and good works, that many conclude the commandments of God to be evil, or void of obligation in themselves, or of authority as the rule of a believer's conduct!—But true Christians derive great benefit from the holy law; and none have any thing to fear from it, but "the lawless and disobedient, the ungodly and profane." We have all indeed deserved condemnation: "there is none righteous, no not one;" except as made so by faith in Christ, and through his grace; and even those who partake of this blessing, fall far short of that perfect love and obedience which the law demands.—It is allowed, that few in comparison have been guilty of actual murder, parricide, men-stealing, or perjury; that many are free from the guilt of adultery, and other still baser practices, and even of fornication. Yet, the same corrupt nature is in us all: and our enmity against God, and ingratitude to him: our disposition to disobey and despise parental authority: to hate and quarrel with our neighbours; to please ourselves, regardless of their good and the glory of God; and a variety of polluted thoughts and affections, lying and other vain words, and very many other things "contrary to sound doctrine," would expose us to the wrath of God, and justify him in our final condemnation. Unless, therefore, we are "made righteous by faith in Christ," and truly repent, and forsake every sin, we are yet "under the curse of the law," even, "according to the gospel of the blessed God," preached by St. Paul; and at the same time we are unmeet to share the holy felicity of heaven.

V. 12—20. It is peculiarly encouraging, to recollect what manner of persons have been converted, pardoned, "counted faithful, put into the ministry," eminently qualified for that sacred service, and made instruments of great good to mankind. Several, who before were "blasphemers, persecutors, and injurious," have, in different ways, been most usefully employed on earth, and are now with holy Paul in heaven, celebrating the rich mercy and grace by which they were made partakers of repentance, faith, and love; and that precious blood by which they were washed from all their sins. These, in their day, bare witness to that "faithful saying," which we now would earnestly recommend to universal acceptation; even "that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." And it always has been greatly encouraging to trembling penitents, when the preachers of this rich grace were themselves evident and affecting illustrations of their own doctrine; "chief sinners," yet pardoned and changed, sent to declare to others the long-suffering and mercy of Christ to them, "as a pattern to all who should believe on him to everlasting life." Indeed no man, with Paul's example before his eyes, can reasonably question the love and power of Christ to save him, whatever his sins have been, if he really desire and endeavour to trust in him, as the incarnate Son of God, who once died on the cross, and now reigns upon the throne of glory, in order to save "all who come to God through him." (Note, Heb. 7:23—25.) For though some, having obstinately rebelled against the light, are given up to final impenitence; all, who penitently seek salvation by Christ, according to the gospel, are most certainly clear of that sin; having committed their crimes, however atrocious, "in ignorance and unbelief." Let us then seek and hope for this salvation: and, in humble consciousness of our unworthiness, let us admire and praise the grace of "God our Saviour, and ascribe to "the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, all honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen." (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—21. 6:1,2.) May all who are intrusted with the ministry, faithfully and valiantly "war the good warfare," with such weapons, as are "mighty through God," to destroy Satan's strong holds. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) May they in their doctrine and examples, and may all Christians in their experience and practice, "hold faith and a good conscience." May all who are tempted to "put away a good conscience," and to pervert the gospel, remember that this is the old way of making shipwreck concerning faith also. And may Hymeneus and Alexander be as beacons, to warn others from these fatal rocks; and as monitors, to "teach them not to blaspheme," and to caution them, "while they think they stand, to take heed lest they fall." (Notes, Ez. 3:20,21 18:24. 33:12,13. 1 Cor. 10:11,12.)

NOTES.—Chap. II. V. 1. Proceeding in his charge to Timothy, the apostle exhorted and enjoined, that "first of all," as a matter of the highest importance, "supplications, prayers, and intercessions," suited to every emergency, and accompanied with thanksgivings for mercies received, should "be made," especially in their public worship; not only in behalf of themselves, each other, and all their fellow-Christians; but "for all men," without distinction of nation, rank, or party; and without exception of their enemies and persecutors, from a spirit of genuine and expansive philanthropy. (Marg. Ref.)—The litany of the church of England accordingly beseeches God 'to have mercy upon all men:' yet even this scriptural petition has been censured, as inconsistent with submission to the sovereignty of God! But, whatever St. Paul understood by "all men," that we understand by 'all men:' if we pray in respect of them at all; and we must pray God 'to have mercy on them,' unless we mean to imprecate vengeance on them. The command, to "love our neighbour as ourselves," is our rule of conduct, and should dictate our prayers. God will hear our supplications for temporal benefits, or eternal salvation, in behalf of those on whom he sees good in his sovereign wisdom to bestow them: and in other cases, our "prayer will return into our own bosom." But how can we pray for enemies and persecutors, (whom we cannot possibly know to belong to "the election of grace,") without equally appearing to interfere with God's sovereignty? How can we pray for our children, relatives, or neighbours, or indeed for any unconverted person, or for those whom we are not sure are converted, without violating the same imaginary rule? The malignity of an apostate indeed, may be so excessive, that it would not be proper to pray for him: (Notes, 2 Tim. 4:14,15. 1 John 5:16—18.) but such exceedingly rare exceptions, to a general rule, in no way interfere with our praying even for the salvation of all men, that now are or ever shall live on earth. This is no more than the Lord's prayer teaches us; (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10.) and if there be any individual, for whom we cannot pray that 'the Lord would have mercy on him,' and convert him; the inability must arise from sin, even the sin of not "loving our neighbours as ourselves." Nothing can tend more to perplex theological subjects; to prejudice men's minds against the doctrines of grace, nay, to bring them into odium and contempt; nothing can more narrow and harden the heart against the human species in general; than this method of making the secret decrees of God, in any degree or way, our rule of conduct, instead of adhering to his revealed will. We know not, and cannot know, who are elect, and who are not: we are bound to love all men, to pray for them, and to do them good: and then leave it to God to govern the universe in his sovereign wisdom, justice and mercy, as he sees good. (Note, Deut. 29:29.)

V. 2. It was a proper expression of benevolence, for Christians to pray for all orders and conditions of men; and to interest themselves in the calamities and deliverances of their neighbours, of the community, and of the human species. This would soften the prejudices, and conciliate the favour of those around them; especially when they persevered in such supplications and thanksgivings, notwithstanding the persecutions which they endured. It would likewise conduce very much to silence the accusations of those who charged them with disaffection to the civil government, and with being troublers of the city, if they not only behaved with quiet subjection to the laws, in all things consistent with their duty, and conscientiously paid tribute and custom; but were also known to pray for "kings, and all in authority" over them, for their perservation, and success in all their lawful undertakings; for the protection and peace of the community, and for all blessings upon their persons and families; and that they oppose no other weapons than these to the injuries which they suffered. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, Ezra 6:6—12. Jer. 29:4—7. Rom. 13:1—7.)—The Ephesians, and others among whom Timothy was called to "do the work of an evangelist," were under the Roman emperor, who was a monster of tyranny and cruelty: the apostle however used the word "kings," in the plural number; whence we learn, that the Holy Spirit intended this direction for other places and ages; according to the different governments established in Providence. (Note, 1 Pet. 2:13—17.) All the kings and rulers on earth were at that time strangers or enemies to Christianity: so that no distinction or exception, in this case, could possibly be intended.—These prayers were to be made, in order that Christians might "lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty," conscientiously attending on all their duties to God and man, without being molested either by public calamities or by persecutions. This object they were to aim at, and with this "quietness and security," to be satisfied. This differs widely from desiring and praying for the success of those enterprises which serve to aggrandize one country, by the depression and miseries of other countries. These indeed are not lawful undertakings, and we may pray for the peace and welfare of our governors and country without so much as appearing to favour these measures. The disposition to lead a quiet, peaceable, and pious life, submitting to human authority, as far as consistent with godliness, tends to procure favour to the true worshippers of God; and it may be expected that he will answer their prayers, (so far as good for them,) by inclining their rulers to tolerate, protect, and countenance them.

V. 3, 4. The conduct above inculcated was "good" in itself, and "acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour;" as a fruit of faith and grace, and honourable to his name. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, 1:1.) For as he has provided for the salvation of mankind, without distinction of rank, or nation, or even previous character; and can honourably, and will certainly, save every individual, who comes to him in his appointed way; in this sense he "willeth that all men should be saved:" (Notes, Ez. 18:23. 33:11. 2 Pet. 3:9.) and it is his good pleasure, nay, his express and repeated command, that we should do all in our power to bring them "to the knowledge of the truth." The gospel should be "preached to every creature;" we are required to assure all whom we can address, that the Lord is able and willing to save any sinner who believes: Christ will say to numbers at the last day, "I called, and ye refused," "I would have gathered you, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, Prov. 1:20—33. Matt. 22:1—10. 23:37—39.)—But as all men do not in fact "come to the knowledge of the truth," which God wills in the same sense as "that all men should be saved;" so the difficulty, if there be any, presses equally on Calvinists and Arminians so called, and even on such as deduce universal actual salvation, from this text and a few similar ones; for they cannot say, "that all men," without exception, actually do "come to the knowledge of the truth." If the clause, therefore, be explained to mean any thing more, than the willingness of God to save all, of every description, who truly believe; and his command, that we should preach to all men, and pray for all men, without distinction; it must follow, that he wills, or purposes, what he does not effect.—It is, however, equally improper to say, with many expositors, that "all men," signifies 'some of all sorts;' because it is obvious to answer, that it may with equal propriety be said, "he willeth that all men should be damned;" for doubtless, some of all nations, ranks, and orders, will be left to perish in their sins, "whereunto also they were appointed." V. 5—7. As a further reason, why Christians ought to "pray for all men," the apostle observed, that there was "One God," the common Creator, Benefactor, and Lord of the whole human species, and as all had apostatized from him, and he had purposes of mercy towards them; so there was also "One Mediator between God and men, even the Man Christ Jesus;" which implies, that there is only one Mediator, and excludes the worship of all other intercessors. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, 1 Cor. 8:4—6. Eph. 4:1—6. Col. 2:18,19.) Jesus Christ is truly "Man:" and though the efficacy of his mediation is derived from the union of his divine nature with the human, in his mysterious Person; yet that mediation between God and Man, is made by his human nature, in which alone he was capable of obeying, suffering, and dying as their Righteousness, and propitiatory Sacrifice, in order to his resurrection, ascension, and intercession as their High-Priest and Advocate with the Father. The apostle designed to excite Christians to intercessory prayers and he draws one argument for this, from the relation which God himself, and the great Mediator, bear to those in behalf of whom these supplications should be offered. God to whom they were to be presented, is the "One God," the Creator of all men; and "the Mediator" through whom they are presented, is "the Man Christ Jesus," united with us in the bond of one common nature; "bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh." (Note, Heb. 2:14,15.) "One God," in this passage, does not denote the Person of the Father exclusively, but the Diety: the manhood therefore of Christ intervenes between a just and holy God and us sinners; but this Manhood is essentially and inseparably united to the Godhead, in the Person of the Son, who thus mediates between God his Father, and men his brethren.—This provision and appointment has been made and revealed, for the common benefit of the human race, both Jews and Gentiles of every nation; that all who are willing may come in this way to the mercy-seat of a pardoning God, to seek reconciliation to him. (Notes, 3:16. Is. 55:1—3. John 4:10—15. 7:37—39. Rev. 22:16,17.) This Mediator therefore gave himself "a ransom for all," as "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world;" that, by the all-sufficient atonement of his death upon the cross, and the redemption there made, a foundation might be laid for the hopes of sinners all over the earth, and that all who believe might actually be saved by it. (Notes, John 1:29. 1 John 2:1,2.)—No pious and considerate man will assert that Christ so gave himself a ransom for all, as actually to intend the salvation of all those who never believe in him; and that he thus failed of his purpose, and suffered in vain. On the other hand, there are but few, even of those who limit such expressions to 'some of all sorts,' who do not allow the all-sufficiency of Christ's atonement; and admit that all men should be invited and commanded to believe in him, and that all who do believe will be saved by him. It is therefore important, far beyond the importance of 'doubtful disputations,' to observe carefully, that none will be saved by the ransom of Christ without true faith; that true faith is "the gift of God," and the effect of regeneration; (Notes, John 1:10—13, v. 13. Eph. 2:4—10.) that "known unto God are all his works, from before the foundation of the world;" and that all will certainly be saved, who were "given unto Christ," and whom he specially intended to save, when he became the Surety of his people. (Note, John 6:36—40.) These propositions are capable of clear scriptural proof: and when they are established, we may safely leave such expressions, as that here used, to bear their most obvious import. Indeed, divine wisdom and love are peculiarly shown, in this general way of stating the truths of Christianity; as far more suitable to inquirers and unestablished persons, than a systematical arrangement would be.—This ransom of the Saviour's atoning sacrifice, once offered, was to be "testified in due time," to all men of every nation: it was therefore incumbent upon every Christian, to promote this great design, according to his opportunity and ability: and hence the obligation of sending and supporting missions to every part of the heathen world. Of this gospel St. Paul was ordained "a preacher and an apostle:" (in asserting which, he solemnly appealed to Christ, who had appointed him, as his heart-searching Judge, for the exact truth of what he had advanced:) so that he was now employed as "a teacher of the Gentiles" especially, in the doctrines and promises of the gospel, in the nature of faith, and in the faithfulness of God to all his declarations and covenant engagements, and in every part of his truth and will.

V. 8—10. According to the authority vested in him, the apostle enjoined, that Christians should "pray every where," according to the directions above given. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, 1—4.) The expression may indeed include prayers in the closet, in the family, and in social meetings; but the chapter especially relates to the manner of conducting public assemblies, in what place soever these were held: for "Where two or three are met together, there," says our Saviour, "I am in the midst of you." (Notes, Matt. 18:19,20. 28:19,20, v. 20. Heb. 10,23—25.) 'As the apostle is speaking of public prayer, his meaning, I suppose is, that the men, and not the women, were to lead the devotion of the assembly.' (8) Marknight. The antithesis between the men and the women, (9) the word itself, the article, and the connexion, "in like manner," combine in establishing this observation.—The Gentiles had priestesses, as well as priests, not only to their goddesses but to their gods also: but the Israelites were not allowed to conform to this practice. "In like manner" women must not be ministers, or preachers, under the Christian dispensation.—In order that men might perform the office allotted to them, with acceptance, they must in reverent adoration "lift up holy hands:" not satisfied with washing their hands before they worshipped, according to the custom of the Jews, and indeed that of many Gentiles; but taking care to keep them pure from all injustice, and the practice of every sin. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, Ps. 26:6—8. Heb. 10:19—22.) It was also necessary, that they should avoid all wrath and resentment, either against each other, or against their persecutors; that their prayers and intercessions might be the genuine dictates of enlarged good-will to all men; and not intermingled with angry passions, whatever provocations might be given them. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Matt. 5:23,24. 6:12,14,15. 1 Pet. 3:7.) At the same time, they should not doubt the willingness of God, through Christ, to hear their prayers, notwithstanding all former sins and present conscious unworthiness; or perplex themselves by vain reasonings or disputations, on the manner in which he would answer them. (Notes, Matt. 21:21, 22. Mark 11:22—26. Eph. 3:20,21. Jam. 1:5—8.)—In order to this proper regulation of religious assemblies, as well as the general conduct of Christians; the apostle furthermore enjoined, in the most decided manner, that "the women should adorn themselves with modest apparel," suited to their station in life, and becoming that "bashfulness, and sobriety" of manners, which would be expected from them: not copying the vain fashions of those women, whose attire was intended to render their persons attractive to beholders; and was at once an indication of the levity of their own minds, and suited to excite the passions of others. He required therefore, that they should not adorn themselves with broidered hair, gold, pearls, or expensive garments. (Marg. Ref. g—i.) This general rule may admit of a few exceptions, in the case of those whose superior rank occasionally requires it. (Note, Esth. 5:1—3.) The appearance of women in the places of worship, is especially intended; and the exhortation implied, that whatever garments they wore, they must consider "good works" as their peculiar ornament, as "it became women professing godliness." (Marg. Ref. k, l.) Yet, it doubtless was meant as a general rule, that Christian women should refuse conformity to the foolish fashions of a vain world, in this respect; that they should choose to appear more plain and simple in their attire, than others of their rank; that they should not waste time, or run into needless expense, in these empty decorations, but employ both their time and money in adorning themselves with good works: (Note and P. O. Acts 9:36—43.) that decency, modesty, and sobriety should be consulted in their garments and appearance, rather than elegance and fashion; and finally, that ministers ought to teach these things to their congregations, as of great importance to the honour of the gospel. (Note, 1 Pet. 3:1—6.)—It has been well observed, that foppery and extravagance, as to dress, in men, are most emphatically condemned by the apostle's silence on the subject, for this intimated, that surely they could be under no temptation to such a childish vanity!—'It is worthy to be noted by the women, that this precept ought not to be slighted by them, as of little moment; seeing it is so carefully inculcated by the two chief apostles of the Jew and Gentile; and the contrary is represented as a practice opposite to godliness.' Whitby.

it may here be added, that it related to public teaching exclusively, and not to any kind or private instruction, by which no "authority over the man" is implied. The women were required to "be silent with all subjection," in the religious assemblies; for the apostle, as Christ's representative and declaring his will, would not "suffer women to teach," for that would be like "usurping authority over the man;" and therefore their willing subjection was to be shown by silently receiving instruction. For the man was first created, and the woman of him, and for his benefit: so that it would be contrary to the original state of things at the creation, for the woman to "usurp authority" over the man. (Notes, Gen. 2: 18—24. 1 Cor. 11:2—16.) Moreover, the man was not "deceived" in the first instance; but the tempter prevailed against the woman, who was first "in the transgression," and the seducer of the man. (Notes, Gen. 3:1—19.) This humbling consideration was suited to convince the women, that they ought not to affect authority, or presume to be public teachers.

V. 15. The sorrows and pains attendant on child-bearing were a peculiar mark of the divine displeasure against the ransgression of the first woman; and suited to bring it to the emembrance of her daughters in every age: yet those who professed the gospel of Christ might be comforted, by the hope of being supported and preserved, through that trying season, and even of deriving benefit from all their sufferings; at least they might be sure, that there was no curse or wrath in it; provided they continued steadfast in the faith, and in love to Christ and his people, with holiness, purity, sobriety, and modesty. (Marg. Ref.)—Some suppose the apostle to have meant, that, as sin first entered by the woman, whence all the pains and sorrows of child-bearing originated; so, through those sorrows, One had come into the world, "born of a woman," by miraculous conception, without man, by whom all those would be saved who continued in the faith: and indeed the original may well bear that interpretation, which is also very ancient.—Eve, whom the apostle had just before mentioned, was thus addressed by her offended Creator: "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children:" yet the preceding verse implied a promise of salvation through "the Seed of the woman," for all believers both men and women. (Notes, Gen. 3:14—16.) Eve herself is generally supposed to have been saved "through child-bearing," or, by One descended from her: though the anguish of bearing children was denounced on her, as a peculiar punishment of her atrocious guilt; and thus her sorrow was turned into joy, her curse into a blessing. In like manner, her daughters, though involved with her in the sentence of bringing forth children with sorrow, would also share with her in the same salvation, joy, and blessing, through the promised Seed; if they copied her example of faith and obedience.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. It is a most important, though much neglected duty, for Christians to pray and return thanks "for all men," according to the different relations in which they stand to them; and as their circumstances require. Thus they may show their love to those whom they cannot otherwise serve, and do them a most important benefit; and also evince, that they interest themselves in the happiness of mankind in general. Not only in public, but in our families and closets, we should pray "for kings, and for all that are in authority;" both as guardians of the public tranquillity, and in respect of their temporal and eternal welfare: this will far more conduce to the continuance of our religious privileges, in being allowed without molestation, "to lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty;" than any means which men of restless spirits can employ. But, whatever effect our conduct, in these things, may have on our neighbours: "it is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour." He "hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that he should repent and live." It is his will, that all who repent and believe in Christ should be saved: "he commands all men every where to repent" and "believe the gospel;" it is his will and pleasure, that we should use every means of drawing men's attention to the gospel, that they may "come to the knowledge of the truth," He is the One God of the whole earth, whom all men ought to worship and serve: and, as all have sinned, and deserved wrath, he has appointed "One Mediator between God and man, even the Man Christ Jesus," his incarnate Son, "who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," "that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." May he "ordain" and qualify many preachers, like Paul, "to teach the nations in truth and verity!" For surely we ought to desire, that "men should pray every where," to "God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ," and by the Holy Spirit, "lifting up pure hands, without wrath and doubting." In proportion as we learn thus to "worship in spirit and truth," with awful reverence, holy love, pure zeal, and lively faith; (Note, John 4:21—24.) we shall find our minds freed from narrow prejudices and resentment, and our benevolence towards all men greatly enlarged; and we shall more fervently and intelligently pray to our heavenly Father, saying, "Hallowed be the name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven:" "for thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen." (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10,13.)

V. 9—15. Whatever renders the gospel respected in the minds and hearts of those who are without, contributes to its success: and the modest, decent, and sober apparel of "women professing godliness" must therefore have this tendency in no ordinary degree. They should evince, that they are too much engaged in contemplating spiritual glories, to take pleasure in the vain and unseemly decorations of the trifles around them; that being "adorned with good works" is their chief desire, the attainment of it their most valued distinction; and that they can make a better use of their time and money, than in curiously adjusting their attire, or purchasing costly ornaments. But alas! in this trifling and expensive age, when almost all vie with their superiors in apparel, till distinction of rank itself is nearly lost, we too often find those, who come to the places where the word of God is preached, decorated as much beyond what they can properly afford, and in as unbecoming a manner, as they who frequent the theatre! It would be well, if the more decided professors of godliness were wholly exempt from this disgraceful vanity: or if they always spent as many hours in visiting the sick and poor, and in labours for their relief, and as much money in relieving their distresses, as they do in uselessly decorating themselves, and their children, after a manner unsuitable to their rank in life, and inconsistent with their profession. These are by no means trifles, or pharisaical impositions, as some affect to call them; but apostolical injunctions: and it should be considered that, as raiment was only made needful by sin; so it is peculiarly unsuitable for those, who profess to believe the Bible, to be proud and vain of the very badge of their disgrace.—The original creation of the man, and then the woman: and the entrance of sin by the woman, who "being deceived was first in the transgression," concur in showing the reasonableness of that subjection, humility, and teachableness, prescribed in Scripture to the woman, and the impropriety of her usurping authority over the man. But, as the gospel gives special encouragements to the woman, in respect of those sorrows, which the entrance of sin has entailed on her, provided she continue in faith and love, "with holiness and sobriety;" so the consideration of those manifold sorrows, to which the female sex is subjected, should teach men to exercise their authority with the utmost gentleness, tenderness, and affection. (P. O. Eph. 5:21—33. 1 Pet. 3:1—7.)

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1. It has already been shown, that the word rendered "bishop," was at this time of the same import with that translated "elder," or presbyter: (Note, Acts 20:17.) for the charge, given by Paul to the Ephesian elders, is here supposed to have been subsequent to the writing of this epistle. The same is also proved, by the silence of the apostle, concerning any other order than bishops and deacons. (Note, Phil. 1:1.) Indeed, it is evident, that the selection or appointment of an individual, to be overseer of the elders or pastors, though very ancient, and probably apostolical, was not at this time in general use. (Note, Rev. 2:1.)—It had been said, and it was a "faithful saying," and worthy of especial notice; that if a man "desired," or earnestly longed for the pastoral office; and from love to Christ, to his flock, and to the souls of men, was ready to forego other prospects, and expose himself to hardships and perils, by devoting himself to that service; he sought to be employed in "a good work," most important in its nature and object, honourable to the person himself; and more conducive to the glory of God,

V. 2. It is manifest, that Timothy was supposed to be principally concerned in the choice of the bishops, being the apostle's deputy and representative; and accordingly, instructions are here given him, how to fulfil this arduous charge in the proper manner; instructions, no doubt, intended to be useful in the highest degree, if duly regarded, to all others in every age and place, on whom the same most important trust should devolve.—The apostle therefore showed, very particularly, what manner of persons these "bishops" or elders ought to be; in order that mercenary, ambitious, and other improper desires after the sacred service might be repressed; and likewise, that those who had been appointed to it might know how to behave in it. Whatever natural abilities, learning, elocution, or spiritual gifts, any man might possess; he must be considered as ineligible to this office, if not of a "blameless" character, and if he had not avoided scandalous vices, at least since his professed conversion to Christianity.—He ought also to be "the husband of one wife." Christ and the apostles expressly condemned polygamy, as well as divorces, except for adultery. (Notes, Matt. 19:3—9. Mark 10:2—12. 1 Cor. 7:1—5.) Yet there was no direct command for a man, who had previously taken more wives than one, to put the others away when he embraced the gospel; and such a requisition, might in some instances have produced very bad consequences in domestic life, and increased the opposition of the civil powers to the preaching of Christianity. But the rule, that no man, however qualified in other repects, should be admitted into the pastoral office, who had more than one wife, or who had put away one to take another, tended to show the unlawfulness of polygamy and divorces on frivolous pretences, and their inconsistency with the Christian dispensation; and concurred with other things to bring them into total disuse in the Christian church, yet without violence and confusion.—To argue hence, as it has been done, that polygamy was lawful for other Christians, else it would not have been needful to restrict pastors from it, would prove, (if it proved any thing,) that it was also lawful and common for them to be drunkards, covetous, brawlers, or strikers.—Some have inferred from this text, that stated pastors ought to be married, as a pre-requisite to their office; but, this seems to be a mistake of a general permission, connected with a restriction, for an express command. It is, however, abundantly sufficient to prove, that marriage is entirely consistent with the most sacred functions, and the most exemplary holiness; and to subvert the very basis of the antichristian prohibition of marriage to the clergy, with all its concurrent, and consequent, and incalculable mischiefs. (Notes, 4:1—5. Heb. 13:4.)—Yet, some have even endeavoured to infer a part of that system from this clause itself, and have supposed that the apostle meant to prohibit second marriages to the clergy! But this is contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture; it is by no means contained in the meaning of the words; and would certainly bring in a part of those evils, which long experience has proved inseparable from the general prohibition: for as good reasons may very often be given for marrying a second time, as for marrying at all.—The pastor must also be "vigilant," a circumspect and attentive man; one who watches carefully over his flock, capable of discerning dangers at a distance, guarding the people against the artifices of false teachers and the devices of Satan, and prompt to embrace opportunities of usefulness: he must be "sober," serious, and temperate; moderate in all his desires and indulgences; "of good behaviour" in all the transactions of life; showing a meek, kind, equitable, faithful, and prudent disposition towards all men. He should likewise be ready, according to his ability, to relieve the poor, to entertain his brethren without grudging, and with evident cheerfulness and satisfaction; especially, he ought to be hospitable to Christians, who were driven from home by persecution, or who, in any other way, were brought to the place of his residence.—'Now that the ancient customs are changed, and inns are every where open, in which travellers, for their money, may be as well accommodated as in private houses; there is little occasion for what the apostle calls "hospitality."' Macknight.—This is a specimen of the way in which many learned men (some perhaps without intending it) show, that we have little or nothing to do, either with the practical or doctrinal part of Scripture! I should rather, on the other hand, say, 'Now, that ancient customs are changed, and bishops, generally poor in the apostle's time, have ample revenues; they are bound to exercise enlarged hospitalty to the poor, especially to the inferior clergy, who often have little of that money which is needful for accommodation at inns; and who, if hospitably entertained by bishops, would feel cordially reconciled to the affluence of such kind superiors, and disposed to receive their pastoral instructions with reverence.' Here let me observe in particular, that when young men go for ordination, or ministers for institution, to places where they cannot be accommodated except at an inn; it is incalculable what mischief might be prevented, and what an opening would be made for usefulness, if the bishops would entertain them in their own houses; and take the abundant opportunities, which this would afford, of instructing them respecting the nature and importance of those solemn engagements into which they are about to enter. The affection and veneration thus excited, in all who are in any degree proper for these sacred services; and the opening thus made for subsequent admonitions and counsels, would repay the expense of it a thousand fold. A bishop must be ready at teaching, both capable of instructing others, and prompt to embrace every occasion of doing it, in public or in private; counting it his business, and making it his delight. 'However we understand the word "bishops," it must be allowed, that they ought to be preachers and teachers, and that frequently and promptly; and not unpreaching prelates.' Latimer.

V. 3. The person eligible to the office of a bishop, must also be free from every degree of intemperance, in the use of wine or strong liquors, which would both be scandalous to him, and unfit him for the important duties of his station. (Marg. Ref. 1. Notes, Lev. 10:1,2,8—11. Prov. 31:4—7.) He ought also to be equally superior to anger; and not apt, on any provocation, however great, to express the vehemence of his passion by striking the offender, as it was a common practice among worldly men. Nor must he be greedy of gain, which might lead him to prostitute his ministry for the sake of "filthy lucre;" or to carry on some employment, along with his ministry, in a disgraceful manner, for the sake of profit. But he must be of a resigned, meek, persevering, and constant spirit; peaceable, forgiving, and calm; not clamorous in disputation, or even in reproving others; nor yet tenacious to any degree of avarice, even of that property which he had obtained in the most unexceptionable manner.

V. 4, 5. The bishop, or pastor, should likewise be able and careful to govern his own household, in a discreet and regular manner: maintaining a meek yet firm authority over his domestics; and "having his children in subjection, ruling over them with all gravity," and restraining them from all levity and excess: that their appearance, deportment, and attendance on the worship of God, might render them an example to others. For if a man were evidently incompetent to govern his own family, and to preserve order and decorum in it; how could it be supposed, that he was qualified to preside over "the church of God," and to preserve order and harmony among the numbers of whom it consisted, who were of various dispositions and situations, and removed a great part of the time from under his immediate inspection. and the things of God: lest the distinction of his situation, or the applause bestowed on him, should elate him with pride and ambition; and he should thus fall into a condemnation similar to that of the devil.—It is evident from this, that spiritual pride and ambition constituted the beginning of Satan's apostacy. (Marg. Ref.) Some have conjectured, that it was revealed to the angels, that the eternal Son would assume a nature inferior to theirs, in which he would rule over them, and be worshipped by them; and that Satan, and the other angels who fell with him, proudly disdained such subjection. But all our conjectures on this subject must be uncertain, and in a measure presumptuous. The pride, however, and ambition of ministers on account of their office, gifts, popularity, or success, would be of a nature in some respects similar to Satan's pride in heaven, and might involve "the novice" under a similar condemnation.—It is evident, that some exceptions to this most important general rule, must have been admitted, in the first formation of newly-planted churches, in which the miraculous gifts and endowments conferred by the Holy Spirit, seem to have superseded the necessity of that previous study and experience, which are, in all ordinary cases, indispensable. V. 7. The person elected to this office must also have a good report, an unblemished character, even among his unconverted neighbours; "lest he should fall into reproach," lose his influence, disgrace the gospel, and be ensnared by Satan into the practice of his former evils, and entangled in the world and sin. It would not, however, be generally adviseable, to appoint those to the ministry, whose conduct had been remarkably scandalous; until a competent time had elapsed, to evince the reality of their repentance, and to retrieve and re-establish their characters. (Marg. Ref.)—It is evident, that the apostle did not here at all speak of the several duties of ministers; but only of the general conduct and character of those, whose desires after that office were to be countenanced, or the contrary, by Timothy and by others concerned. Nothing, therefore, can be proved, as some have attempted, from supposed omissions of any duties of ministers, or parts of their office; for this was not the apostle's subject.—Which are without.] Notes, 1 Cor. 5:9—13. Col. 4:5,6.

V. 8—13. The deacons were primarily appointed to dispense the charity of the church, and to manage its secular concerns: yet they preached occasionally, or taught in private, or were readers in the public assemblies; and pastors and evangelists were often chosen from among them. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Acts 6:1—8. 8:5—40.)—Many of the same endowments were requisite in those eligible to this office, as in the pastors or bishops. They too must be "grave," serious, and prudent men; sincere, candid, and consistent in their discourse; not "double-tongued," speaking one thing before men's faces, and another behind their backs; neither flattering, slandering, dissembling, nor prevaricating, in any company, or on any occasion: not "addicted to much wine, or greedy of filthy gain;" which might tempt them, after the example of Judas, to embezzle the money committed to them, or might unfit them for liberally and impartially supplying the wants of the poor. (Note, John 12:1—8.) They must also profess and maintain "the mysteries of the faith, with a pure conscience," and a uniform integrity of conduct; that so they might recommend it to others. It was proper, even in respect of this inferior office, to make trial of new converts; that previous to their admission to it, they might be approved to be men of blameless conversation. The wives also of the deacons (and much more those of the spiritual pastors,) must be of grave and serious deportment; not addicted to the vanities and dissipations of the world; "not slanderers," or prone to circulate disadvantageous reports of their neighbours; but sober women, temperate in all things, and faithful in the discharge of every relative and religious duty. Nor would it be proper for those who had, previously to their conversion, taken more than one wife, or divorced one for the sake of taking another, to exercise the office of a deacon. It was requisite, that they also should rule their children and domestics, in a regular and exemplary manner. For the faithful discharge of this office would conduce to the increase of their gifts and graces, and to render them very bold in professing the faith. They would be much employed among the poor and sick, and such as were imprisoned for the gospel: and, by thus exposing themselves, and giving counsel and encouragement to their suffering brethren, they would be emboldened and habituated to a promptitude of utterance, which would be "a good degree," or step, towards their admission to the office of pastors or evangelists.—This interpretation has been contested: yet it seems to be the apostle's meaning; and, without adverting to modern habits or controversies, it is evident, that the due discharge of the primitive office of a deacon must tend to qualify men for the ministry. It also appears from facts, that some deacons either were before preachers or became so afterwards; nor is there any reason to think, that persons were then regularly educated for the pastoral office; but ministers seem to have been always chosen from the most established and best qualified believers, and generally from those who were matured in years and experience. This does not, however, in any measure imply, that a regular education is not, in the present state of things, the most expedient and highly desirable.—Be proved. (10) 'By publishing their names to the church, that if any one hath aught to lay to their charge, he may show it.' Macknight.—No doubt this was customary in the primitive church, and productive of many good effects: indeed the form of it remains to this day. But it does not appear that the original word can admit of this interpretation; for it generally means, that trial of persons and of things, which is made by experience and observation, or by judging of them by some established standard; as goldsmiths assay the precious metals.—Wives. (11) Some think, that the wives of deacons are not here meant; but women, who were selected and appointed by the church, to teach those young persons of their own sex, who were restrained by local customs, from so attending on the instructions of men, as to obtain from them an adequate acquaintance with Christianity. It is however very doubtful, whether this be the apostle's meaning; and the instruction from the passage, as interpreted of the wives of those who performed any public office in the church, is so replete with instruction, that it seems highly worthy of the special mention made of it by the apostle.

V. 14, 15. The apostle hoped, when he wrote this, that he should soon be able to return to Ephesus: but such events subsequently occurred, that probably he never again visited that city, and Timothy, much sooner than had been intended, came to him into Macedonia. (Preface.)—In case, however, the apostle should not see Timothy for some time; he wrote this epistle to show him how he ought to conduct himself, as an evangelist intrusted by him, and by the Lord Jesus himself, to regulate affairs in the family or household of God; even that society of believers, in whom the living God dwelt, as in his holy habitation. 2:4—6.) These directions were not peculiar to the state of things among the Ephesians; but would be a rule to Timothy in other churches also, where he might sustain the same office, and perform the same services; and to all others in subsequent ages, who should be employed in a similar manner. —"The church of the living God," by supporting, maintaining, and recommending the truth of revelation, by the public preaching and profession of that truth, and by the worship and service performed in it, may be considered as "the foundation" which upholds the edifice, as a pillar that supports and adorns it. This by no means includes the infallibility of any particular church: but merely implies, that divine truth is upheld, professed, and maintained in the true church: whilst ungodly men in general, and heretics in particular, oppose, pervert, and undermine it; and so error and ignorance envelope all the rest of the world, as with a dark and dreadful cloud. (Marg. Ref. b—f.) Some apply it to Timothy and other faithful ministers: (Gal. 2:9.) but this seems to be only a part of the preceding instruction; for the profession and suitable conversation of believers, as really maintain and recommend the truth, as the minister's labours and doctrines do. (Note, Phil. 2:14—18.)—Others detach the sentence from this verse, and connect it with the following; as if the apostle had meant, that "the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh," was "the pillar and ground of the truth:" but this construction seems inadmissible: for this great mystery is an essential part of the truth, of which "the church is the pillar and ground." And as the church is appointed to maintain, hold forth, and "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour," in the midst of a dark and wicked world; it was very important that Timothy should know how to conduct himself, in subserviency to this great design.

To behave thyself. (15) Ἀναστρέφεσθαι. See on Matt. 17:22. Eph. 2:3.—Ground.] Ἑδραίωμα. Here only. Ἑδραιος. See on 1 Cor. 7:37. In the church the truth is stationed, supported, and upheld.

V. 16. That "mystery of godliness," which the church must maintain, was confessedly very great. (Note, Matt. 13:10,11.) It never could have been thought of, if it had not been revealed; it could not be received, except by faith; and it must be very imperfectly understood by man in his present state, being closely connected with infinite and incomprehensible objects. Some persons might on that account deem it less credible; and others might attempt to obviate the objection, by explaining away the mysteriousness of it: but the apostle declared it to be "beyond controversy a great mystery."—"Great is the mystery of godliness." "God was manifested, &c." It continued a great mystery, after the fullest revelation of it. It must, however, be noted, that it "is the mystery of godliness." (Marg. Ref. h. Note, 2 Thes. 2:5—7.) The revelation and belief of it have always been, and are, the beginning and spring of all pious dispositions and affections, in the hearts of fallen men, and of all the spiritual worship of God in the world.—Had this mystery never been revealed, there would not have been any true "godliness" among men; none can be found, where this mystery is unknown or rejected; and "godliness" abounds in proportion as it is scripturally proposed and received.—By this mystery, men learn the true character of God, as "a just God and a Saviour," and the way in which sinners may approach and worship him; they discover their real situation, their danger, and their remedy; and thus they are brought to fear, trust, love, worship, obey, and rejoice in God. The substance and centre of this great mystery is this, "God was manifest in the flesh:" the divine nature, in the Person of the coeternal and coequal Son and Word of God, "was manifested" to fallen men, as dwelling in the man Christ Jesus; so that whoever saw, or contemplated by faith, this express "Image of the invisible God," saw the Father also. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Is. 7:14. 9:6,7. Matt. 11:27. John 1:1—18. 14:7—14. 15:22—25. Phil. 2:5—11. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:1,2.)—Thus sinners "acquaint themselves with God," and are reconciled to him. This high character Emmanuel claimed, when on earth; and the unmeasurable unction of the Holy Spirit in his human nature, as demonstrated by his perfect holiness and stupendous miracles, justified his claim. But the Jewish priests and rulers put him to death, because he, being man, made himself "God," (Notes, John 10:32—38. 19:1—7.) and he was "justified" in this by the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the apostles and disciples, who bare witness to his resurrection and ascension into heaven. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Acts 2:33—36. 3:12—16. 4:5—12. Rom. 1:1—4.) During the whole of these most astonishing events, "he was seen of angels." These "morning stars, who sang together" when he called the world into existence, (Note, Job 38:4—7.) saw their incarnate Lord laid "a babe in a manger," and sang "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good-will towards men." (Note, Luke 2:8—14.) They saw him fasting forty days in the wilderness, and tempted by the devil; they witnessed his agonies in the garden; and, in both cases, they were employed to minister unto him. (Notes, Matt. 4:8—11. Luke 22:43.) They saw their incarnate Maker expire, amidst the most cruel indignities, on the cross; with what sensations, who can conceive! They witnessed and attended his resurrection and ascension: they now behold his glory, sing his praise, and execute his mandates; and they will at length be his attendants when he shall come to judge the world. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, Matt. 28:1—8. Luke 24:1—9. Acts 1:9—12. Eph. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) In all this, they contemplate with astonishment, delight, and adoration, the infinite wisdom, justice, holiness, truth, and love of God: and "desire to look into these things," as more conspicuous displays of the divine glory, than all his other works had exhibited.—"God manifest in the flesh," had also been "preached to the Gentiles," as their Lord and Saviour, which was a great mystery to the Jewish nation. (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, Rom. 16:25—27. Eph. 3:1—8. Col. 1:25—27.) And thus he had been "believed on in the world," when the apostle wrote, by many tens and hundreds of thousands of different nations, who, without the Mosaic law, were become the spiritual and accepted worshippers of JEHOVAH: and the case has continued in a great degree the same to this day. This was the effect of his having been "received up into glory," and proved to a demonstration his exaltation to the mediatorial throne; "all authority in heaven and earth having been given to him," as the Advocate and Intercessor for sinners. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, Matt. 28:18.)—This most important part of Scripture seems to have been obscured, and confined in the interpretation given of it, by the attempt of some expositors, to reduce the overflowings of the apostle's fervent spirit to their own ideas of method. But the events referred to cannot be reduced to exact order of time, without evidently doing violence to the meaning of the words.—The construction of the verse necessarily requires, that the first clause should serve as the nominative case to the subsequent verbs.—On the above interpretation the construction is as follows: "God was manifested in the flesh;" "God, manifested in the flesh," was justified by "the Spirit, was seen of angels, &c." But many have laboured to establish another reading from some manuscripts, ancient versions, and quotations, to this effect: "the mystery of godliness, which was manifested in the flesh." (Ὅ, instead of Θεος.) According to this reading, it must follow, "which" mystery "was justified in the Spirit;" which mystery "was seen of angels;" which mystery was "preached unto the Gentiles;" which mystery was "believed in the world;" which mystery "was received up into glory." The mystery being "manifested in the flesh," and "the mystery being received up into glory," are not very intelligible propositions: but numbers seem to prefer absurdity to orthodoxy, especially in respect to the person of Emmanuel. Others, on similar authority, substitute "who." (Ὃς for Θεος.) But there is no antecedent to this relative, except "God," in the preceding verse: "The church of the living God, (the pillar, and ground of the truth; and without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness,) who was manifested, &c." This brings in the same doctrine, but with a very unnatural parenthesis.—The authority for either of these readings is by no means satisfactory; and the internal evidence for that adopted in our translation is so strong, that it turns the balance completely on that side, in my judgment at least.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The office of a minister is an arduous and laborious, "but a good work," in every respect. It is indeed that most honourable, useful, and important employment, in which Emmanuel himself chose to be occupied; while he refused to assume the office of King, during his abode on earth. They who desire it, therefore, as "a good work," from proper motives, do well; and, if duly qualified, they should be encouraged and assisted in obtaining their object. But to desire emolument or authority in the church by intruding into this sacred office; without either qualifications suited to its important duties, or any purpose of performing them; from indolence, ambition, and love of "filthy lucre;" is the vilest of all prostitutions, and merits the deepest condemna

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle foretells a great apostacy, and corruption of Christianity, in after times, 1—3; shows that "every creature of God is good," and to be received with thanksgiving and prayer, 4, 5; and directs Timothy, in respect of his doctrine and personal conduct, that he may preach and live in such a manner as "to save himself and those that hear him," 6—16.

tion. Let then none, who desire this office, or have entered into it, or who have any concern in admitting others, forget that nothing can compensate for the want of proper motives, or a blameless conduct, in those who minister in holy things. The pastors of the Lord's flock should be continent, vigilant, sober, "of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach," and remote from violent passions, and every kind and degree of covetousness. The more extensive the sphere, and the more conspicuous the station, to which any of them are called; the greater measure of all these holy endowments are requisite: but no man can be a meet person for the pastoral office, in the most obscure situation, who is unwatchful, frivolous, licentious, given to wine, greedy of gain, disposed to furious anger, negligent of moral and relative duties, selfish, averse to hospitality, and unable or unwilling to teach the flock. It would be invidious to contrast this description with the characters of very large numbers who have sustained the ministerial office, in different ages and parts of the visible church, and still do sustain it. No order of men fulfil the duties of their station: but alas! none have violated them so generally and grievously as nominal ministers. It, however, behooves us "to look to ourselves," and to those with whom we are concerned. We, who bear this office, should "pray without ceasing," to be enabled more fully to transcribe these words of the apostle into our hearts and lives: and the people should learn to distinguish mercenaries from upright disinterested ministers. They should indeed make allowance for human infirmities, which are incident to all: they should help their ministers by their prayers: blessing God for such as are faithful, and earnestly and with much perseverance supplicating converting grace for such as are evidently the reverse of what they ought to be.—It is incumbent upon ministers to "rule well their own houses, and to have their children in subjection with all gravity." (Note, Gen. 18:18,19.) If they find this too difficult for them, "how shall they take care of the church of God?" The folly, ostentation, conformity to the world, extravagance or ungodliness of a minister's family, will inevitably and greatly lessen his influence, and prevent his usefulness, as well as ruin his comfort. It is also very wrong for novices, however eminent for abilities and gifts, to be pushed forward prematurely into this arduous work. This has ruined many promising young men, by puffing them up with pride, and so casting them into "the condemnation of the devil." The honour of the gospel also is greatly concerned in "the good report" of ministers, among "those that are without." And Satan finds various advantages against such as lose their reputation, and incur the reproach of the enemies of the gospel; and not only against them, but against the cause of truth and holiness.

V. 8—16. Not only bishops and elders, but all concerned in "the church of the living God," should be grave, sincere, upright, candid, temperate, and disinterested; those especially to whom money is intrusted, and who have the charge of relieving the poor: for to rob them is one of the very worst kinds of dishonesty. (Notes, Prov. 22:22,23. 23:10,11. Am. 5:10—13. 8:4—10. Mic. 3:1—4.) The "mystery of faith" will never appear respectable among men, except it be held in "a pure conscience." Professed Christians should therefore be proved, and found blameless, before they are admitted to any office in the church. Time spent in preparation and probation will not be lost; and a precipitate zeal is not one of the prescribed qualifications for the ministry.—All who are connected with persons in public stations in the church, should be exemplary in their whole appearance and deportment. The wives of ministers and deacons should be "grave and sober, no slanderers, but faithful in all things." They should choose such wives; and their wives should be reminded to study and practise these instructions; and to assist and concur in ruling their children and households well.—Those who have acted faithfully and diligently in inferior stations, are best qualified for more important services; especially when by enduring hardship and facing danger, they have "attained to great boldness in the faith of Christ." These things should be frequently meditated upon, and prayed over, by all persons concerned; that they may know "how they ought to behave in the church of the living God;" (Note, Acts 20:28.) according to the relations in which they stand to him, to his saints, and to the world; that they may hold forth and adorn the doctrine of truth, as pillars and supporters of it. This "doctrine of God our Saviour" will be despised or revered, in great measure according to the conduct of professors of the gospel; which will be greatly influenced by that of ministers, their families and connexions. (Note, Tit. 2:7—10.) The importance of these things is therefore unspeakable; and our watchfulness ought to correspond with it.—While numbers want a religion "without mystery," (which those who worship the incomprehensible God cannot possibly have,) and while many seem to make the very truths of the gospel "a mystery of ungodliness;" let us glory in the incontrovertibly "great mystery of godliness," and show the sanctifying efficacy of it in our lives. Let us remember that "God was manifested in the flesh," to take away our sins; "to destroy the works of the devil; to redeem us from all iniquity, and to purify us unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works;" and let us recollect, that the doctrine of his mysterious Person and redemption must be "justified" by the fruits of the Spirit, evidently appearing in our lives. Let us learn to contemplate his antecedent glory, his voluntary humiliation, his subsequent exaltation, and his future coming to judgment, till we hate sin, despise the world, are transformed into his image, filled with his love, and prepared to join the worship of his holy angels: and let us still pray, that he may be preached to all the nations on earth, and believed on in all parts of the world; and so let us wait till he shall please to receive us up to his glory, that "where he is, there we may be also."

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—5. To stir up Timothy, and others by him, to adhere steadfastly to the "great mystery of godliness," (Note, 3:16.) the apostle declared, that the Holy Spirit spake, in the most express and decisive manner, not only by Daniel, and others of the ancient prophets, but to Paul himself by immediate revelation, and perhaps to several of his brethren, concerning certain persons in the latter days, under the Christian dispensation, or in after times, who would apostatize from the true faith of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. a, c, d. Notes, Dan. 7:7,8,19—27. 11:31—39. 2 Thes. 2:3,4. 2 Tim. 3:1—5. Rev. 13: 14:) This apostacy would be effected, by men's hearkening to false teachers, who would be influenced by seducing spirits; and thus they would embrace "doctrines of devils," or demons; and adopt such notions about the souls of the dead, as would introduce the worship of saints as intercessors, and of angels as spirits superior to men, though inferior to God. This was a species of idolatry, like that of the heathen, in worshipping their departed monarchs, legislators, and benefactors, as "demons," or a middle order of beings between God and men. And, as devils are the real objects of all worship paid to mere creatures, so this delusion would tend to gratify the ambition of these apostate spirits. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, 1 Cor. 10: 18—22. Col. 2:18,19.) These doctrines and practices would be supported "by the hypocrisy of liars," who would invent a variety of legends, impose on men with pretended miracles and revelations, cheat them by fabricated tales; and thus carry on an infamous traffic, by forgery and imposture, under the pretext of great sanctity, to the aggrandizing of themselves, and the deluding of the credulous multitude. (Marg. Ref. g. Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) Nor would these men feel remorse, for their lies and forgeries, however impious and destructive: as the habit of villany, under the mask of extraordinary piety, would cauterize their consciences, and render them entirely callous; even as the external skin becomes unfeeling, by being frequently "seared with a hot iron." To maintain their usurpations over men's minds, and to fix a large body in their interest by detaching them from other connexions; as well as to amuse mankind by the appearance of uncommon sanctity; they would discourage and even forbid marriage, as if it were an unholy estate and unfit for devout persons: they would deny the liberty of marrying to numbers, especially to the clergy: by means of which, all kind of abominations would be introduced, and connived at. (Note, 3:2.) They would also enjoin abstinence from this and other kind of meat, either entirely, or on particular day seasons: by this likewise they would keep up their authority over men's consciences, and impose upon the multitude with apparent devotion; whilst they perpetrated all kind of iniquities, as the Pharisees had done before them. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, Matt. 15:1—14. 23:)—But God had created every kind of wholesome food for the benefit of man, and allowed Christians the use of it all, indiscriminately, at all times and seasons, without restriction: and therefore any of his creatures might be "received with thanksgiving by those who believed the truth," and so far understood it as to know their Christian liberty. (Notes, Rom. 14:2—4,13—18.) For, all his creatures, being in themselves good, and serving the purposes for which he made them, nothing was to be refused as unclean, provided it was received with thankfulness as the permission of his word, a temperate use of it, according to his precepts, and prayer for a blessing upon it, sanctified it to the believer's use, and to fit him for the Lord's service. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Note, 1 Cor. 7:10—14.)—Every one, who is at all acquainted with ecclesiastical history, must know what apostacy and corruption of Christianity has most entirely accorded to this prediction. The Judaizing teachers and the Gnostics, and others, contended indeed for some of these superstitions; "the mystery of iniquity," in these respects did "even then work:" but it was reserved for the church of Rome fully to prove the truth of the Scriptures, by accomplishing these predictions in their most detestable enormities. It has been shown in what manner the errors of the Judaizing teachers, and the traditions of the Pharisees, on the one hand, and the speculations of the heathen philosophers, on the other, corrupted the pure doctrine of Christianity in the primitive times. (Notes, Col. 2:8—23.) But, it should not be forgotten, that in subsequent ages, especially in the Roman church, the mythology of the Pagans, and the writings of the poets, helped to introduce still further corruptions. For what are the nuns of popery, but the vestal virgins of the Romans, engrafted on Christianity? The monks indeed are an unprecedented addition. Saints and angels, as mediators, answer to the demi-gods and heroes of the Pagans; (Note, 1 Cor. 8:4—6.) and the numerous processions and festivals of the papists, and the method of observing them, answer with surprising exactness to those described in Homer and Virgil, especially in the latter. Indeed, it appears to me, that a learned man, who had leisure to compare all the pompous and fascinating outward services in the church of Rome especially, though not there exclusively, with the Greek and Latin poets, might form, I had almost said, a Rubric and a ritual from the latter. At least, I have never, for many years, opened Virgil to read a few pages; but I met with some things, which cogently reminded me of the popish processions and festivals.—' The third verse contains one of the boldest ellipsis in the New Testament, where a word is to be understood, contrary to that which is before expressed: but, some of the most celebrated classical writers, and particularly Horace and Cicero, take the same liberty.' Doddridge. The passage undeniably demands this construction: and all the ancient expositions and versions supply the ellipsis in the same manner, or to the same meaning. (Note, Acts 15:19—21.)—Latter times. (1) Marg. Ref. c.—Devils.] This term, thus used, proves that the worship of saints and angels, as mediators, in the anti-christian system, is as much idolatry, and centres as much in the worship of evil spirits, as the Pagan worship did; and that it was introduced, and is maintained by the seduction of "the devil and his angels," even as heathen idolatry was.

V. 6—10. Timothy was directed to attend to the foregoing precautions himself; and also "to put his brethren in remembrance" of them, that they might be upon their guard against every specious delusion. Thus he would be "a good minister of Christ;" and act as it became one, who had been fully instructed "in the words of faith and of good doctrine," and who had digested them well, and turned them into spiritual nourishment: for he had been trained up in these things, was diligently studying them, and indeed had made great proficiency. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, 2 Tim. 1:3—5. 2:14—18. 3:10—12,14—17.) But he ought steadily to reject the impious fables and foolish traditions of the Jewish deceivers, and of others who perverted the gospel; which were no better than the stories, with which the weakest and most ignorant of women, when almost superannuated, used to amuse children. He ought, therefore, to treat such impertinences with the neglect which they merited, and to exercise himself, by daily study, meditation, and practice, in every part of "godliness;" as consisting of a right state of mind and heart, and consistent conduct of life, towards God; and as attained by sinners, through the believing contemplation of "the great mystery of godliness," and by faith in the divine Saviour. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, 3:16. Tit. 2:11,12.) In this he must make daily progress himself, and this he ought to inculcate on others. For no diligence in mere externals, however laborious, self-denying, or exact, could be of great use to any man. Even the Mosaic ceremonies had but little profited the Israelites in general, and in no degree those who depended on them; nor could they avail the Jewish Christians: and all human inventions and observances must in all cases be far more unprofitable and vain. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Matt. 15:1—11. 23:1—7. Luke 11:37—40. Acts 15:7—11. Gal. 3:6—14. Col 2:20—23.) But "godliness," according to the principles and rules of the gospel, "is profitable unto all things:" it is abundantly advantageous to the man himself, to his connexions, the church, and society. The promises of temporal prosperity to Israel, as annexed to their national obedience, were indeed no longer in force; and godliness might expose a Christian to many outward losses and persecutions; (Note, 2 Tim. 3:10—12.) nor were any promises of wealth, prosperity, or long life given by the gospel: yet, the new covenant engaged to bestow on believers such spiritual peace, and such abundant supports and consolations, and they were under such a peculiar care and protection of Providence, that godliness might well be said to have "the promise both of this life, and of that which is to come." (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, 6:6—10, vv. 6—8. Ps. 84:11,12. Matt. 6:33,34.) This was therefore to be considered as "a faithful saying, and worthy of universal acceptation:" (Note, 1:15,16.) for in dependence on these promises, in experience of their accomplishment, and in promoting godliness among mankind, the apostle and his brethren both laboured without wearying, and suffered reproach without fainting: because they "trusted in the living God," who is "the Preserver of all men," in respect of their lives and temporal concerns; and who will therefore take especial care of believers, as interested in his covenanted blessings. Or, who is the Saviour of sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, and of mankind in general; so that none are rejected when they seek to him for salvation; of which believers are already made partakers by his special grace. (Marg. Ref. f—k. Notes, John 1:29. 1 John 4:9—17.)—Do they, who seem dissatisfied with this interpretation, (as some are,) really intend to maintain, that all men without exception will eventually be saved? 'The author of the book De Vocatione Gentium expounds this very well, telling us, that by saying ... "He is the Saviour of all men," he confirms the general goodness of God towards all men; and by adding, "especially of them that believe," he shows, there is one part of mankind, who through the benefit of divinely inspired faith, is by special benefits advanced to the highest and eternal felicity.' Whitby.

V. 11—16. Timothy was here required solemnly to charge, and enforce on the consciences of the pastors and people, the practice of all those things in which true godliness consists: and to teach them the nature, obligation, motives, and encouragements of it. (Marg. Ref. i.) As he was younger than men generally were, to whom services of so high importance were allotted, and probably than several of the elders at Ephesus; it would be peculiarly incumbent upon him to act with that peculiar sedateness and wisdom, which might exclude every one from the least pretence of despising his person or admonitions, on that account. (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, 1 Cor. 16:10,11. Tit. 2:15.) It behooved him, therefore, to be "an example" to the whole company of believers, by a steadfast and consistent adherence to the word of the gospel, in his profession and preaching; by a pious, pure, and edifying "conversation" and habitual conduct; by "love" to the Lord, his people, and all men; by spirituality, and all the fruits of the Holy Spirit; by a lively exercise of faith in the mercy, promise, and providence of God, amidst all hardships and perils; and by purity, avoiding whatever might excite suspicion in respect of those youthful lusts, by which so many were contaminated. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 2 Tim. 2:20—22.) "Till the apostle came to him," which he then hoped to do, though it turned out otherwise, (Note, 3:14,15.) let him devote a part of his time to the study of the Scriptures, or of any other books which could add to his fund of profitable knowledge; and to exhorting and instructing the people in sound doctrine. (Marg. Ref. p—s.) As he had been endued with excellent gifts, which were conferred upon him according to the prophecies of inspired men respecting him, when he was solemnly ordained to be a minister and an evangelist, by the imposition of the hands of the elders, as well as those of the apostle; let him not neglect to exercise and improve those gifts: for some who received them afterwards became negligent, or made a bad use of them; nay, perhaps, were deprived of them on that account. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, 1 Cor. 14:)—Or, the ministerial office itself may be intended. (Notes, Eph. 3:1—8.) Let him therefore assiduously and carefully "meditate on those things," and well consider the various important duties to which he was called. Let him "give himself wholly to them," or be "entirely in them," making them the one great business and pleasure of his life, and cordially devoting all his time and abilities to this important service: (Note, Phil. 1:21—26.) that his growth in wisdom, in ministerial endowments, and in holiness, might be manifest to all around him. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, 6:20,21. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 4:1—5.) He was indeed placed amidst various snares and difficulties, and had the same deceitful heart as other men had: he ought, therefore, to take special "heed unto himself;" to the state of his soul, his own growth in grace; to his motives, temper, and conduct in every particular. He was also required to look well to his "doctrine," that it was scriptural, evangelical, and practical; well stated, explained, defended, and applied: placing every part in due proportion and connexion, to form one perfect whole; and thus "declaring the whole counsel of God." (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) And, whatever trials or discouragements he might meet with, let him persevere steadfastly in this course; and he would thus ensure his own salvation, help forward that of other believers, and be the instrument of conversion and eternal salvation to many of those who attended on his ministry. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. The Scriptures are arranged with such consummate wisdom, that the apostacies of those who "give heed to seducing spirits," and teach "the doctrine of demons," introducing idolatry and various dire corruptions into the church, "turn to a testimony" to every humble believer; who, reading that "the Spirit spoke expressly" of these things long before, is thus most fully convinced of the divine authority of the sacred oracles.—Those who allow themselves "to speak lies in hypocrisy," for their secular purposes and interests, will gradually become callous in impiety and iniquity, as if "their consciences were seared with a hot iron:" and no desperate infidels or profligates become so destitute of all feeling and remorse, as the sanctified impostor; nor ought we to deem any enormity incredible, when properly authenticated, as committed by men of this description.—Those false teachers, who most neglect the commandments of God, and allow themselves and others in the most atrocious violations of moral and relative duties, are generally very prompt to forbid as evil what God has pronounced innocent and honourable; and to command as a duty what he has left indifferent. But "the law of the Lord" is "exceedingly broad:" and we shall find abundant exercise for watchfulness, diligence, self-denial, and mortification of the flesh, in attending to its holy requirements; without being laid under further restrictions, or tasked to imaginary duties: as if we had at present done all his will, and wanted more employment! We should, therefore, be upon our guard against impositions of this kind, on whatever pretence they are enforced; and, while we follow after purity, and exercise temperance in all things, according to the will of God; let us disregard such as judge us in those things which he has allowed.—While we are satisfied, that "every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused;" let us remember, that all should be "received with thanksgiving, by them who believe and know the truth;" that even the divine allowance will not sanctify an intemperate, inexpedient, extravagant, unthankful, or cruel use of the creatures; and that nothing will be good to us, except we seek, by prayer, the Lord's blessing on our use of it.

V. 6—16. They, who would approve themselves to be faithful ministers, must "put the brethren in remembrance" of all those things, which Christ and his apostles delivered to the church; and, whatever other studies or accomplishments may be supposed requisite, in those intended for the ministry; it is, above all, necessary, that they "be nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine;" and that they well digest that knowledge of the Scripture to which they have attained.—Instead of amusing ourselves and others, with ingenious fancies and curious speculations; or with enforcing human inventions and superstitions, by imaginary or fallacious explanations of their origin, meaning, and benefit, which are often no better than "profane and old wives' fables:" we should exercise ourselves and instruct others, in the substantial duties of godliness. This has at all times the promise both of this world and of the next; and our present solid satisfaction (as well as our eternal happiness) is inseparably connected with it; but all else is "vanity and vexation of spirit." "This faithful saying is worthy of universal acceptation:" apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, both "laboured, endured reproach," and faced death in all its terrors, in support of it; because "they trusted in the living God;" who, being "the Preserver of all men," and "the Saviour of the world," will surely take especial care of those who believe, and cause all things to work together for their eternal good. (Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 8:28—31.)—It behooves all, who "command and teach" these things, to take heed that "no man despise them:" but this is especially incumbent on young ministers, when called into conspicuous situations; who should be doubly careful to "abstain from all appearance of evil;" and to shun all levity of conduct, as well as whatever is more directly criminal, or leads to criminality. For they will be narrowly observed, and many will be ready to deem them unfit for their arduous services; especially when they are called to instruct or to admonish their seniors and superiors. Ministers should also be careful to confirm and elucidate their instructions by their example; and thus to lead forward believers to steadfastness in the faith, holiness of conversation and conduct, fervent love, spirituality, fidelity, integrity, and purity. Their time should be employed in reading and medita ting on the Scriptures; in acquiring religious knowledge; and in communicating it, by the public and private duties of their ministry. This will leave them no leisure for dissipated pleasures, trifling visits, or idle conversation; and but little for amusing and merely ornamental studies. That measure of endowment, which God has given them for the work to which they have been set apart, and to which they solemnly devoted themselves, when ordained by "the laying on of the hands of the" pastors of the church, must not be neglected, or left to decrease by disuse, but be diligently exercised and improved.—Alas! we cannot but reflect with grief of heart, that so few of those called ministers seem so much as to have ever seriously read these directions! and that their method of spending their time, the subjects of their studies, the objects of their pursuits, and the business and pleasure of their lives, form a perfect contrast to what they ought to be. But, may the Lord have mercy upon each of us, and write these admonitions in our inmost souls! May we "meditate" continually "on them!" May our thoughts and affections be engrossed by them! May we "give ourselves wholly unto them, that our profiting may appear unto all men!" Let every minister, then, hear the apostle call upon him to "take heed to himself," as one who must give account; to look to it, that he experience the power of the gospel in his own soul, and bring forth the fruits of it in his life; that his motives, tempers, words, and works, be pure and evangelical; that his doctrine be scriptural; that he "declare the whole counsel of God," and that he "manifest the truth to every man's conscience, as in the sight" of his heart-searching Judge. And let every one, who has thus begun his ministry, persevere in this holy living and faithful preaching; however despised, reviled, opposed, or discouraged he may be: for in so doing, he shall both "save his own soul," and those of his attentive hearers: while dumb and greedy dogs, blind watchmen or guides, mercenary teachers, and gay triflers in the garb of Christian ministers, in short all those "who look every one for his gain from his quarter," however otherwise distinguished by rank, nobility, learning, or eloquence, can have no reason to expect any other event of their conduct, than that of going before their deluded followers, into the pit of everlasting destruction. (Note and P. O. Is. 56:9—12.)

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. The connexion of the word translated "an elder," in this place, has induced expositors in general to understand it of senior Christians, as well as of pastors. It must, likewise, be supposed that the apostle spoke of such faults, as resulted from infirmity, and were not openly scandalous: or the counsel would seem inconsistent with a subsequent injunction. (Note, 19,20.)—As Timothy was young, it was peculiarly incumbent on him to avoid harshness, in animadverting on the misconduct of aged ministers or Christians: he ought not therefore to rebuke them with severity, or in apparent anger; but to "entreat them" to act with greater circumspection, and endeavour modestly to convince them of the impropriety and bad effects of the mistakes into which they had been betrayed: even as a son, placed in authority, would address an honoured parent, who had not acted with due regard to his character and situation. In reproving young men or ministers, it would be proper to speak with great meekness and affection, and to admonish them "as brethren." The elder women he must counsel and caution, as dutiful sons in such stations would their mothers; and he should behave towards the younger women with that kind of regard and affection, which is borne to sisters; and "with all purity," that nothing contrary to the strictest decorum might attend his ministerial converse with them.

V. 3, 4. The apostle next directed, that the aged widows, who were really destitute, should be honourably provided for. But if any widow had "children, or grandchildren," who were capable of relieving her; they ought to be required, as a duty of the first importance, to "show piety," or a respectful and grateful affection, "at home;" requiting the tender, laborious, and expensive care of their parents towards them, in infancy and childhood, by providing for them in old age: for that was good in itself, a debt due to them, and an acceptable service to God, even in preference to any other charitable work. V. 5, 6. The "widow indeed," whom the apostle peculiarly intended, was one who was "desolate," having neither children nor relations able to maintain her; being destitute of the means of procuring a decent subsistence: at the same time "she trusted in God" to provide for her, and used no improper methods of obtaining a support: but devoted herself to his service, in continual prayers and supplications, stated and occasional, public and private, and even by night as well as by day; taking great delight in devotion, and employing herself very much in supplicating God in behalf of her fellow-Christians and all mankind. (Marg. Ref. o—r. Note, Luke 2:36—38.) But any one who lived a delicate, luxurious, dissipated life; and perhaps chose to continue unmarried, that she might have less restraint, in this self-indulgent course, must be considered as "dead in sin," and alive only to worldly pleasure: so that no honourable attention was due to her from the church. V. 7, 8. The things above stated Timothy must give in charge to the pastors and deacons; that the Christians at Ephesus might be preserved "blameless;" and that no encouragement might be given, even by means of their benevolence, to such persons as were a scandal to the cause.—But if any man refused to provide for his own near relations, especially for his wife, children, and household; or for his aged parents; through sloth, covetousness, extravagance, or self-indulgence; he should be considered as having renounced the faith, by manifestly and habitually refusing to obey Christ; nay, as acting in this particular more disgracefully and unreasonably, than an unbeliever would do in similar circumstances.—The heathen in general considered children as bound to support their aged parents; and reckoned the neglect of this duty infamous, and fit only to be mentioned along with the most scandalous vices.—The manner in which many covetous persons grievously pervert this text, must not pass unnoticed: while they evidently violate the duties of piety, equity, and charity, as well as that of providing for their indigent relations; yea, while they bring up their children, and maintain their families, in a manner utterly unsuitable to their circumstances, from eagerness to amass riches; they often quote this verse, in vindication of their sordid avarice; and imagine, that the apostle commanded men to neglect all other

V. 9—12. The apostle could not here mean that no widows were to be relieved by the church, who were under sixty years of age: for the distresses of younger widows, as well as of other poor persons, might be very urgent.—He is, therefore, generally supposed to speak of a certain number of widows, who were discharged from all secular cares, and maintained by the church; of whom such as were able acted as deaconesses, to visit sick and poor women, and to administer relief and counsel to them; to instruct young women, and perhaps children; or to attend on any other concerns of the church, its ministers, and pious strangers, which lay within their province. Though no command is given for such an order of persons in the church; (for many things of this kind seem to have been left discretionary, and to be determined according to circumstances;) yet they might frequently be useful, if properly selected and regulated. (Note, Rom. 16:1,2.) In this view the propriety of the rule here given is apparent. As the apostle counsels "the younger widows to marry:" (Note, 13—15.) it cannot be imagined, that he would exclude any when grown old, from the number here intended, if otherwise qualified, merely because they had followed his counsel. By "the wife of one man," therefore, the apostle did not intend to exclude such as had married a second time, which the Scripture no where disallows, or at all discountenances. But shameful and astonishing irregularities, in this respect, were common among the heathen women: they frequently left their husbands to live with other men, and then sometimes returned again to their former husbands; they often, designedly, gave them just cause to divorce them, on purpose that they might take other husbands; nay, they sometimes did what was equivalent to divorcing their husbands: nor were these things deemed scandalous; at least not in that degree which they would be at present, in countries professing Christianity. If then, any woman had formerly conformed to these corrupt customs, it would not be consistent with the credit of Christianity, to admit her into this select number of devoted widows, though no other objection lay against her; for it must exclusively consist of those who had lived virtuously and honourably in the married state. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Note, 3:2.)—Some expositors indeed think, that those who had married again, after being divorced, were intended: but there is not the least intimation in Scripture, that the divorced should be restrained from marrying again, even if justly put away: and surely then not when unjustly divorced.—The women, however, spoken of, must also be such as had an established character for "good works" since they were converted to Christianity. Those were to be preferred, who had charitably educated the children of their poor relatives or neighbours, or who had faithfully done their duty towards their own children: who, when in more prosperous circumstances, had hospitably entertained strangers in their houses; who had willingly stooped to the office of washing the feet of the saints, when wearied with travelling; (Notes, Gen. 18:3—8. Luke 7:44—50. John 13:1—17.) and who had, from love to Christ, readily relieved the afflicted, and diligently "attended to every good work." (Marg. Ref. d—k. Note and P. O. Acts 9:36—43.) Widows of this character, when grown old and left desolate, were the proper persons for this service.—But the apostle directed Timothy to reject the application of "younger widows:" for experience showed, that their avowed purpose, of no more entering into the married state, was not to be depended on. After a time, when their grief on account of their loss had subsided, various circumstances might induce them to marry again: and, as their admission into the number of devoted widows implied an engagement to the contrary, and probably was attended by some promise to this effect; so their violation of it might be called "a waxing wanton against Christ," leading them to be unfaithful to him, for the sake of some earthly object. Thus their engagement would tend to their condemnation, by occasioning them to violate that fidelity to Christ, which they had previously promised: the church would see it necessary to censure them; and their sin would expose them to condemnation if not repented of. They might perhaps be tempted to apostatize from the faith, by marrying heathens; which seems to have been the case with some of this description. For Christians would not be disposed to marry those who had entered into this number; and if their inclinations led them to marry, their situation might expose them peculiarly to this temptation.

V. 13—15. It might likewise be feared, and experience had shown that there was danger, lest "younger widows," being freed from the employments of domestic life, and having much leisure, should neglect to spend it in devotion, and the duties of their station; and so contract habits of idleness, and waste their hours in sauntering from house to house, as trifling visitants; tattling and gossipping about the news of the day, and intermeddling with other people's affairs, spreading slanders, and speaking many things of a mischievous and improper nature. (Marg. Ref. q—t. Note, 2 Thes. 3:10—12.) The apostle did not mean that all "the younger widows," who were employed in this service, acted in this manner: but it was an evil incident to the practice, and formed a sufficient reason for excluding them. He therefore decided, as one having authority, that it was better to leave them at liberty to marry, if they chose it and circumstances admitted, that they might be occupied in the useful duties of wives and mothers, and in domestic business: that so no occasion might be given to any adversaries of the gospel to speak reproachfully of it, through the misconduct of such as professed to be peculiarly devoted to the service of Christ. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) For indeed, some younger widows, being improperly admitted into this number, had turned aside to follow the suggestions of Satan, had married unbelieving husbands, and so relapsed into idolatry.—'The converting men to the Christian faith, being the "turning them from Satan unto God;" ... the casting off the faith may well be styled, "the turning aside after Satan."' Whithy. (Marg. Ref. a. Note, Acts 26:16—18.)—The apostle's determination, that no widow under sixty years of age, should be admitted into this select number of devoted women, lest their useless lives and misconduct should occasion scandal, and his counsel that younger widows should marry, conclude with peculiar force against all vows of virginity, taken by young persons, under pretence of more strict religion than can be practised in the married state, and against all censures of second marriages, as such: and, indeed, the silence of the apostle concerning women, who had never been married, in this whole argument, is very expressive. But the pastors of the church, before many ages had elapsed, abundantly made up this supposed deficiency!

V. 16. In closing this subject, the apostle required all believers, men and women, who were able, to relieve widows belonging to their own families, and others who were destitute; that the church might not be burdened with them, or prevented from relieving such as were entirely indigent and friendless. (Notes, 3—8.)—'In the opinion of Estius, this precept extended to the proprietors of slaves; and bound them to maintain their slaves when they became incapable of labour.' Macknight. The spirit of it, no doubt, extends to servants of every kind, who have spent their strength in our service, as far as we are able to support them. V. 17, 18. Many expositors infer from these verses that there were 'ruling elders' in the church, who did not preach; but others do not allow the inference; and, in general, ruling and teaching are united. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, 3:2,4,5. Matt. 24:45—51. 1 Thes. 5:12—15. Heb. 13:7,8,17.) Indeed, as "double honour" chiefly relates to a more plentiful and decent maintenance; it is improbable, that mere rulers, who would not be greatly taken off from their secular business, should be thus liberally maintained at the expense of their brethren. To preside in the affairs of the church, and to preach the word, even the doctrine of Christ, constitute the outlines of the pastoral office: the direction seems therefore to mean, that those who ruled most prudently, faithfully, and diligently, and were most laborious in their ministry, should be respected and provided for more honourably and plentifully: especially they, who were most unwearied in preaching, and in private exhortation; as the exercise of authority was more suited to the natural disposition of the human heart. It is found only, Matt. 10:10. Luke 10:7. The apostle must therefore have read either Matthew or Luke's gospel, before he wrote this epistle. And seeing he quotes this saying, as "Scripture," and represents it as of equal authority with the writings of Moses; it is a proof, not only of the early publication of the gospels, but of their authenticity, as divinely inspired writings.' Macknight. (Notes, 1 Thes. 5:23—28. 2 Pet. 3:14—16.)

V. 19, 20. The character of an elder, or pastor, was of very great importance: it would therefore be improper, not only to condemn him, but even to "receive an accusation against him," except it was attested by two or three credible witnesses. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Note, Deut. 19:15—21.) Many might be disposed to revile those faithful ministers, whose doctrine and reproofs had offended them; and indeed, the grand enmity of "the accuser of the brethren," and of all his servants, would be excited against them. (Notes, Job 1:9—11. 2:4,5. Zech. 3:1—4. Rev. 12:7—12.) It was therefore highly reasonable, that no accusation tending to bring the conduct of an elder to a public investigation, and thus to impeach or endanger his character, should be regarded, if supported only by one solitary testimony; which his denial of the crime would at least counterbalance. But, in respect of those who were evidently guilty of any scandalous offence, whether elders or others; Timothy, as presiding in the church, was required to "rebuke them before all" their brethren; not only in order to their being made ashamed, and brought to repentance; but that others might fear the same censure, and so be excited to greater circumspection. V. 21, 22. The apostle here most solemnly charged Timothy, as in "the presence of God, and the Lord Jesus Christ;" and as he hoped to join the company of "the elect angels," who had been preserved and confirmed in holiness, when many of their company apostatized and ruined themselves; who then witnessed his conduct, and would attend, when he should give an account of it to his sovereign Judge; (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. 24:29—31. 25:31—33. 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) that he should observe those things with the utmost care and exactness, whatever opposition and trials he might incur; and, in all his regulations, carefully avoid "preferring one to another," through carnal affection, attachment, connexion, or obligations; not showing "partiality," either in censuring offenders, or ordaining elders, or in any other part of his important service. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Note, 2 Cor. 5:16.) In ordaining elders especially, he must be careful not to act in a hasty manner; but take time to examine into men's characters, principles, motives, and endowments, that he might not be induced "to lay hands" on improper persons, by importunity employed in their behalf. He would need great care in this immensely important concern, to avoid being "partaker of other men's sins;" and becoming answerable, in part at least, for the crimes of those who thus intruded into that sacred function, to the dishonour of God, the great detriment of the church, and the ruin of immortal souls: for even an obliging and easy temper might betray him into much criminality, from which he must by all means keep himself pure. (Marg. Ref. y—b. Note, 2 John 7—11.)—It is manifest that Timothy is here and elsewhere supposed to possess great authority in the Ephesian church, both in superintending the elders already ordained, and in ordaining others. It is allowed, that he was an extraordinary person, especially appointed by the apostle to this service; but there is no proof, that he conferred miraculous powers by the imposition of his hands, as the apostles did: and indeed it is altogether improbable. We cannot indeed by any means infer the divine right of episcopacy, from the authority exercised by Timothy, Titus, and other evangelists: yet it is at least highly probable, that it was very early found expedient, and conducive to peace, to have a stated presiding inspector of approved wisdom and piety, who might superintend the pastors and the concerns of a few neighbouring churches, as moderator and censor; and be peculiarly attended to in the appointment of church-officers. Hence a moderate episcopacy was very early, probably even while some of the apostles lived, generally prevalent in the church: indeed, this seems to have taken place, between the time when St. Paul gave his admirable parting charge to the elders, or bishops of Ephesus, and the time when St. John, from our Lord's own mouth, wrote epistles to the angels of the seven churches in Asia. (Note, Rev. 2:1.) And, after all the abuses, usurpations, controversies, and prejudices, which have since been introduced, the time may ere long arrive, when experience will convince pious men of different persuasions, that something of this kind, properly conferred, limited, and exercised, would prove a suitable remedy to those multiplied divisions, which so weaken and disgrace religious societies, which, in doctrine worship, and practice, may be considered, in many respects unexceptionable. V. 23. This verse is a remarkable instance of the apostle.

25 Likewise also [e]the good works of some are manifest beforehand; and they that are otherwise [f]cannot be hid.

neglect of exact method in inditing his epistles.—It occurred to his mind, when reflecting on Timothy's manifold cares and labours, that his frequent indispositions might be increased by too great abstemiousness; to the prevention of his usefulness, and the shortening of his days. He therefore broke in upon his subject, to counsel him, not to drink water any longer, at least as his only liquor; but to use a little wine to strengthen his stomach, and preserve his health. We may hence form an estimate of the exact temperance practised by these laborious servants of Christ; who so zealously pleaded the cause of Christian liberty, who placed no dependence on their own works, and who never prescribed their own conduct in these things, as a rule for other men! (Marg. Ref. Notes, 3:3. 4:1—5.)

V. 24, 25. (Note, 21,22.) In respect of the choice and ordination of ministers, it might further be observed; that "some men's sins" were so notorious, and so easily proved, that they lay open beforehand, and anticipated the judgment, which ought to be formed of their conduct and pretensions. In other cases they "followed after," so that diligent and impartial investigation would be requisite in order to detect them. In like manner, some persons, applying for admission into the public service of the church, had a sufficient testimonial in their known and abundant good works, which were manifest before any peculiar inquiry was made: and when this was not the case, yet upon due investigation, Timothy and others might become acquainted with them. So that in most instances, an impartial attention to the business, without respec of persons, would enable those concerned to know who were, and who were not, eligible to public stations. (Marg. Ref.)—'I speak not of men, whose good or bad works are manifest beforehand; for they without further discussion or examination may be admitted, or are to be rejected; but of those whose vices or good works are latent. For they, after examination and inquiry, cannot be long hid. And so, if thou be not hasty in laying on of hands, thou mayest timely discover them. Or if by this means thou canst not do it, thou wilt not be partaker with the sinner, having done as much as was in thy power to discover them.' Whithy.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. There is a respect due to the aged, which must not be withheld by their juniors, even when placed in authority over them, or on account of incidental faults. Every thing harsh and unassuming must be improper, in the conduct of young ministers towards their seniors, as it would be in the conduct of a son to his parents. Indeed, admonitions are generally most efficacious, whether to old or young, when meekness and affection unite with firmness and faithfulness.—The greatest caution, as well as purity, is requisite in the conduct of ministers, (especially while in the prime of life,) as to their most needful converse with the younger women in their congregations, neighbourhood, and acquaintance: that all occasion, appearance, and suspicion of evil may be prevented; and the neglect of this caution is very frequently productive of lamentable consequences, in various ways: even where direct criminality does not take place, or is indeed designed.—It is an indispensable duty, for children and grandchildren, to requite the kindness of their aged parents; (Note, Gen. 48:15.) this "is good and acceptable with God:" nor are more distant relations exempt from a measure of the same obligation, when they can afford it; that neither the church, the parish, nor the public, may be charged; but that the contributions, raised in any way, may be applied to such as are really destitute. But, if any who profess the gospel, through sloth, improvidence, selfishness, or other corrupt principles, wilfully neglect or refuse to provide for their near relatives: they, in the apostle's judgment, virtually "deny the faith," and are even in this particular worse than their openly unbelieving neighbours. And may we not, by parity of reason, infer, that they who neglect to instruct their household in religious knowledge, and to do what they can for the salvation of their relatives, act altogether inconsistently with the Christian profession? (Note, Gen. 18:18,19.)—Aged widows, and others of good character, who are left destitute in the decline of life, ought to be honoured, as well as supported. It seems the intent of these Scriptures to teach us, that every religious society should, as far as it is able, make provision for persons of this description, and not leave them to sordid penury, or to the "tender mercies of the wicked," in their old age. But then this provision should be limited to such as "trust in God, and devote themselves to his service, in prayer and supplication night and day;" at least to such as give evidence, that they are of a widely different character from those "who live in pleasure, being dead whilst they live." Alas! what numbers are there of this latter description, among nominal Christians, even to the latest period of life! And how much does the same leaven work among more decided professors of evangelical truth! These things, however, we must give in charge, that the company of believers may be preserved blameless; or at least that we may deliver our own souls. (Notes, Ez. 3:17—19. P. O. 16—27.)

V. 9—16. Every one, who is brought forth into notoriety in the church, should, as much as possible, be free from scandal; and many are proper objects of charity, who ought not to be employed in public services.—Those who, in domestic life, have shown most diligence, humility, compassion, benevolence, love to the people of God, and "readiness for every good work," are most likely to fill up leisure time profitably, and to be faithful in whatever is intrusted to them.—It is not sufficient to determine, what would be best in itself apart from all other considerations, in respect of things not absolutely obligatory, or things unlawful: the state of human nature and facts must be attended to, that it may be known what is most generally expedient. It might have seemed plausible to admit the young widows, or other young women, to such a service in the church, as implied an entire devoting of themselves to religion for the rest of their days; yet the apostle, not only with the wisdom derived from deep reflection and extensive observation, but under the influence of the divine Spirit, decided otherwise. He knew that this would expose them to temptation, and lead many into sin; that it would tend to ensnare some of them into improper marriages, and even occasion their apostacy and ruin; that it would give others of them a habit of indolence, sauntering, slandering, intruding into matters not belonging to them, and improper conversation; that it would therefore be generally better for them to be employed in the duties of the married state, and in the cares of a family; and that this would give less occasion to the enemies of the gospel to speak reproachfully, and Satan less opportunity of prevailing against them. (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:32—35.) Alas! what immense numbers, in every age, have shown their total ignorance of human nature, and have done incalculable mischief, by attempting to improve on his plan, or rather directly to subvert it!

V. 17—25. The office of a minister is "honourable" to all, those alone excepted who are a disgrace to the office: but the most prudent, faithful, and diligent, especially the most "laborious in the word and doctrine," ought to be more honoured than others, and best provided for. The reverse proportion indeed seems almost every where to be adopted in this matter: but the Lord will provide for his faithful servants, whatever method men may follow in disposing of their favours. (Note, Deut. 18:6—8.)—It may be expected, that the impartial public reprover will be exposed to the attacks of malicious calumniators: and, though his faults should not be connived at, accusations against him ought not to be regarded, except well authenticated: but those who give public offence by their crimes, should be rebuked publicly, that others may be put upon their guard.—All who are employed in important services in the church, especially in admitting men into the ministry, or allotting to them ecclesiastical preferments, or committing to them the care of immortal souls in a diocese, or in a parish, or in any other way, or in taking cognizance of their conduct, should consider themselves as most awfully charged by the apostle, "before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, to observe these things, without preferring one before another." The neglect of this rule, in the exercise o. ecclesiastical authority, has given its opponents one of their most plausible arguments against it. So very much has been done, and is done, out of carnal respects, and "by partiality" to relatives, friends, and connexions; that the exercise of all authority of this kind has been and by numbers at present is considered as unlawful.—How far those concerned in ecclesiastical matters are culpable, in respect of "laying hands suddenly" on improper persons, without due inquiry and circumspection, or from complaisance to superiors, or friends, or relations; and how far this rule is observed or violated in all its extent; every man's conscience must determine for himself, till Christ shall come to take an account of his servants. But it is certain that these things involve a responsibility of no ordinary magnitude; and that immense criminality must rest somewhere: as the multitude of ignorant, slothful ambitious, avaricious, immoral, and heretical clergymen, who remain uncensured, throughout this land, and in every part of the visible church, most manifestly proves. There must somewhere be those, who are, in this respect, "partakers of other men's sins," and that in a most tremendous degree: and it must require great care and conscientiousness, for any one absolutely to "keep himself pure."—It is extremely difficult, under any form of church government, to conduct every particular, in such a manner as to "do nothing by partiality:" this will require circumspection, firmness, intrepidity, disinterested zeal, and "the meekness of wisdom:" and these cannot be obtained without much fervent prayer. These things, however, must be carefully observed by those who would not "be partakers of other men's sins;" as every person concerned must feel in proportion to his conscientiousness: but those who honestly desire to do their duty, will generally be directed in it. Some men's sins will be discovered at once, "going before to judgment;" others require more diligent

CHAPTER VI.

The duty of servants to unbelieving and to believing masters, 1, 2. Timothy must shun those, as corrupters of the gospel, who teach things contrary to the apostle's doctrine, 3—5. The advantage of godliness with contentment, 6—8. The mischiefs arising from the love of money, 9, 10. The apostle exhorts Timothy to flee from these evils, to "follow after righteousness," and "to fight the good fight of faith," 11, 12; and most solemnly charges him to be faithful till the coming of Christ, 13, 14. He ascribes glory to the eternal God, 15, 16. Timothy must charge the rich to avoid pride, and confidence in wealth; and to abound in liberality, as seeking a treasure in heaven, against the time to come, 18, 19; and he must adhere to the faith, avoiding profane and vain controversies, 20, 21.

LET as many [a]servants as are under the yoke [b]count their own masters worthy of all honour, [c]that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed.

2 And they that have [d]believing masters, [e]let them not despise them, [f]because they are brethren; but rather do them service, [g]because they are [h]faithful and beloved, [h]partakers of the benefit. [i]These things teach and exhort.

3 If [k]any man teach otherwise, and consent not [l]to wholesome words, even [m]the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to [n]the doctrine which is according to godliness,

4 [o]He is [t]proud, knowing nothing, but [s]doting [p]about questions and strifes of [q]words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings,

5 [r]Perverse disputings of [r]men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, [s]supposing that gain is godliness: [t]from such withdraw thyself.

[Practical Observations.]

6 But [u]godliness with [x]contentment is great gain.

7 For [y]we brought nothing into this world. and it is [z]certain we can carry nothing out.

8 And [a]having food and raiment, let us be therewith content.

9 But [b]they that will be rich, fall into temptation, and a [c]snare, and into [d]many foolish and hurtful lusts, [e]which drown men in destruction and perdition.

10 For [f]the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some [g]coveted after, they have [g]erred from the faith, [h]and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

search; whilst the good works of others are manifest, and they that are otherwise may yet be known upon due inquiry: so that a sufficient judgment may generally be formed, for the regulation of men's conduct, if their minds and hearts be free from prejudice and partiality.—Finally, let us observe, that eminent grace will connect the strictest temperance with the most fervent zeal for the liberty of the gospel: that it is the duty of every one to use proper means for the preservation of his health and life, as a debt which he owes to the church, the community, and his family: and that those who are frequently infirm, who labour abundantly in important services, and whose earnestness in spiritual things induces a disregard to animal indulgence, should attend to the advice of those who give them proper directions for a due regard to their health.

NOTES.—Chap. VI. V. 1—5. (Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Col. 3:22—25. Tit. 2:9,10. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) The apostle next directed, that Christians, who were "under the yoke" of slavery, should quietly attend to the duties of their lowly situation; "counting their own masters" entitled to all the respect, fidelity, and obedience, which that superior relation demanded; and not supposing that their religious knowledge, privileges, or liberty, gave them a right to despise their heathen masters, to speak or act disrespectfully to them, to disobey their lawful commands, or to expose their faults to their neighbours. This they ought to attend to, that "the name of God might not be blasphemed," and his truth and worship reviled, among the Gentiles, by means of the failure of Christian servants in acknowledged duties. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 5:13—15. Tit. 2:3—15.) And such of them, as enjoyed the privilege of "believing masters," ought by no means to despise them, or withhold from them due respect and obedience; because they were brethren in Christ, and so upon a level in respect of religious privileges: but rather "to do them service," with double diligence and cheerfulness, because of their faith in Christ, and their interest in his love, as partakers of the inestimable benefit of his salvation. (Marg. Ref. d—h.)—This shows, that Christian masters were not required to set their slaves at liberty; though they were instructed to behave towards them in such a manner, as would greatly lessen and nearly annihilate the evils of slavery. It would have excited much confusion, awakened the jealousy of the civil powers, and greatly retarded the progress of Christianity, had the liberation of slaves by their converts been expressly required by the apostles: though the principles of both the law and the gospel, when carried to their consequences, will infallibly abolish slavery. (Note, Ex. 21:2.)—These things Timothy was directed to teach and enforce, as matters of the greatest importance: and if any persons taught otherwise, and consented not to such salutary words, which were indeed the words of Christ "speaking by him," and an essential part of "the doctrine according to godliness;" he must be considered as a self-conceited ignorant man, who, being puffed up with an opinion of his own abilities, was ambitious of distinction and applause, though entirely unacquainted with the real nature and tendency of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. i—o. Notes, 1 Cor. 3:18—23. 8:1—3.) —It is not absolutely certain, to what set of men the apostle referred: but, as many of the Jews deemed it unlawful to submit to heather governors; it is probable, some of the Judaizing teachers inculcated, that the worshippers of God ought not to obey heathen masters; and so paid their court to servants, by persuading them that they ought to assert their liberty. But there might be others also, who disregarded and despised these practical instructions: while their attention was taken up with curious and nice speculations and distinctions. Such persons, however, were to be considered as doting, or talking wildly, like sick and delirious persons, about hard questions and disputes of words, names, forms, or notions, which had no connexion with "the power of godliness." Indeed, these questions and disputes tended to excite envy and competition between one and another, angry contests for victory and pre-eminence, mutual revilings and calumnies, injurious suspicions and jealousies; and absurd, obstinate, and violent controversies, between men "of corrupt" and carnal "minds," who were destitute of the real knowledge of the truth and its sanctifying efficacy, and who only sought their own secular advantage; supposing religion to be valuable, in proportion as it tended to enrich them; as if gain and godliness had been but two names for the same thing! Thus they wanted to persuade the Christian servants, that the recovery of their liberty was to be considered as a Christian privilege of great value, which they ought to claim, whatever the consequence might be: and, from the same principle, they sought worldly lucre by their religious profession, and as their leading object. (Marg. Ref. p—s.) From such men Timothy was exhorted "to withdraw himself;" and neither have acquaintance with them, nor spend his time in disputing against them. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, 2 Thes. 3:6—9. 2 Tim. 3:1—5.)

V. 6—10. The proposition before mentioned "that gain is godliness," might be reversed, and thus contain a most important truth. Godliness, connected with a contented mind, is indeed very "great gain;" as it tends to a man's present comfort and everlasting benefit, whatever his outward circumstances are. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 4:6—10. Phil. 4:10—13.) scanty provision will answer that end, as well as a more luxurious and abundant one, and occasion less temptation and sin. In a short time all these things will be finally done with; whereas godliness will soon be perfected in eternal felicity. "Having therefore food and raiment," (or covering, including both raiment and habitation,) and things barely needful for the present, we ought to be contented and satisfied with them; without indulging any desire of acquiring greater affluence, or of being exempted from hard labour and mean fare. (Marg. Ref. a.) For discontent in a lowly situation commonly produces a determination to be rich, if possible; and leads men out of the plain path of honest industry and prudent economy, in dependence on the providence, and obedience to the commandment of God. It is, indeed, evident from facts, that they "who will," or purpose, if possible, to "be rich," give Satan the opportunity of tempting and ensnaring them into such actions, as cannot consist with godliness or a good conscience; urging them to use dishonest means of increasing their gains, and a variety of fraudulent practices. This betrays them into such a multiplicity of employments, and hurry of business, as leave no time or inclination for spiritual religion; and it introduces them into such connexions and companies, as draw them still further into sin and folly. Thus they are brought under the power of "many foolish and hurtful lusts," even "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life;" which mock their expectations, and prove most injurious to themselves and others; till they plunge into inevitable ruin and eternal perdition; as men are drawn in by the vortex of a whirlpool, when they venture too near it, and so are swallowed up and drowned, without any possibility of escape. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Matt. 13:22. Eph. 4:20—24. 1 John 2:15—17.)—For when once "the love of money" is allowed to rule in the heart, it becomes the prolific root of all kinds of evil. Impostures, frauds, lies, thefts, robberies, oppressions, murders, ungodliness, hypocrisy, apostacy, contention, lawsuits, wars, cruelty, pride, luxury, sensuality, or penurious avarice, are some of the noxious weeds, of which it daily produces a most abundant increase, according to the different constitutions, habits, and circumstances of mankind. Every species of impiety, iniquity, and vice, in one way or another, grows from it; and a large proportion of the miseries, as well as the crimes of mankind, originate from the same source. And while some professed Christians, even in the apostle's days, had coveted riches, they had been seduced into apostacy, or led to corrupt the faith, or to act grossly inconsistently with it: and thus "they had pierced themselves through," as with wounds made by a sword, in every part of the body: so that even those who were not finally ruined, were filled with many sorrows, and must endure the most exquisite anguish, in consequence of their folly. All this would have been avoided, if they had been "contented with food and raiment," and watched and prayed against the desire of being rich. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, Luke 12:15—21. Heb. 13:5,6.)—It is not to be supposed, that the apostle meant to establish, as a universal proposition, that every kind and every act of wickedness, grew from "the love of money," as from their only root: for, doubtless, many kinds and innumerable acts of wickedness spring from other roots; which have scarcely any connexion with the love of money: and Cicero, in his Offices, states, that the love of money itself, in many and most insatiable instances, springs from love of power and dominion, for which it is indispensably requisite. But, whoever well considers what influence the desire of riches, not only to hoard them, but to purchase with them the gratification of pride, ambition, sensual inclinations, and even revenge, has on the conduct of mankind, will readily see, that, as a general truth, there is sufficient ground to aver, that "the love of money is the root of all evil." The abandoned prostitute, Judas, who sold his Lord, the traitor who sells his country, and the mercenary teacher of religion, combine in saying, "What will ye give me?" It was the remark of a corrupt, but able statesman in this nation, that 'every man has his price;' and it is in some sense true of every man who is 'a lover of money," of pleasure, or of worldly honour, more than "a lover of God." The ambitious conquerors and destroyers of mankind have always loved money, as the means of accomplishing their object; and have extorted it from those in their power, with the most entire disregard to justice, truth, and mercy. Nor did any one ever desire to revenge himself or remove a rival, by assassination or perjury, but some wretch could be found disposed by love of money to perpetrate the villany. (Marg. Ref. b.)

V. 11, 12. According to the language of the Old Testament, concerning the ancient prophets, the apostle addressed Timothy as a "man of God," one devoted to God, and employed by him as his messenger to mankind: (Marg. Ref i. Note, Deut. 33:1.) as one who bore this high and important character, he exhorted him to "flee," without delay or looking back, to the utmost distance from that destructive whirlpool, in which such immense numbers were continually swallowed up; and to "follow after" more entire conformity to the perfect rule of universal "righteousness," by an upright, faithful conduct towards all men; a proper temper and behaviour towards God in every thing; a lively faith in Christ, and the divine promises in him, as well as faithfulness in his stewardship; "love" to the Lord, to his brethren, and mankind; "patience" under sufferings, and "meekness" amidst injuries and provocations. (Marg. Ref. k—m.) Thus let him "fight," with consecrated armour, "the good fight of faith;" maintaining the honourable and profitable conflict against sin, the world, and Satan, to which the gospel animated him: let him contend earnestly for the prize, by faith and self-denying obedience; by mortifying sin, by resisting temptation, by enduring hardship and persecution, and by using every means with all earnestness and persevering diligence, of weakening the kingdom of Satan, and advancing that of Christ in the world. After this manner let him press forward, till he laid hold, in actual possession, of eternal life; unto which he, as well as the apostle, had been called by the special grace of God, (Note, Rom. 8:28—31. 2 Tim. 1:9.) and had, in consequence, made an honourable profession of the truth, before many witnesses, at his baptism, when ordained to the ministry, and especially in his subsequent labours and sufferings as a preacher of the gospel. V. 13—16. To confirm Timothy in the purpose of persevering amidst his various trials and perils, the apostle solemnly "charged him," as "in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things," or giveth life to all, and could therefore preserve his life, however exposed, and would certainly raise him again to immortal glory, if he laid it down in his cause; and "before Jesus Christ," who had boldly borne witness to the truth, and avowed himself "the Son of God, and the King of Israel," in the presence of Pontius Pilate, when he knew that he should be delivered up to be crucified for maintaining that claim; (Notes, John 18:33—36. 19:8—12.) who required his servants thus constantly to confess him before men; and who had promised to confess them that did so, "before his Father and the holy angels." (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, Matt. 10:32,33. Mark 8:38. Luke 12:8—10.) As "in the sight of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ," the apostle charged Timothy "to keep the commandment" before given, or the trust committed to him, without the spot or blemish of any miscarriage, neglect, or unfaithfulness, from fear of man, or love of the world; that he might be "unrebukable;" that his brethren might see nothing to reprove in him; that the world might have nothing to say against him; and that his Lord might welcome him as a "good and faithful servant;" 'and also to deliver it down to those who may succeed thee, unspotted; that it may shine with uncorrupted lustre, through all future ages, till the appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ.' Doddridge. (*Marg. Amen. (*Marg. V. 17—19. A few rich persons had, it seems, embraced the gospel at Ephesus; and, as wealth is a comparative thing, some more wealthy than their brethren must be found in other places. Now Timothy and other ministers might be tempted to pay them undue deference; or to be afraid of speaking plainly to them, either in public or private; which would have a very bad effect on their ministry: and it would require much firmness and impartiality to give them proper counsel, caution, and instruction. The apostle therefore peculiarly enjoined Timothy to charge them in the most plain, authoritative, and solemn manner, to warn them against the danger to which they were exposed, and to call on them to perform the peculiar duties of their station. He must "charge those that were rich in this world," (which is perfectly distinct from being "rich toward God,") that they should not be "high-minded," or elated by affluence, and superiority of circumstances; as if these implied more wisdom or excellency, or conferred on them higher privileges, ensured them more regard from God, entitled them to pre-eminent authority in the church, exempted them from censure or reproof, or authorized them to neglect or contemn others: and that they should not confide in their riches; as if wealth could make them safe and happy, increase their present comfort, give them any permanent advantage, or promote their eternal felicity. (Notes, Job 31:24—28. Ps. 62:8—10. Jer. 9:23,24.) They must "not trust in uncertain riches;" as all worldly property was liable to be torn from them; as it often proved the cause of distress, temptation, and sin; and as it must speedily be left at death, and be given an account of at the day of judgment. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Notes, Matt. 6:19—24. 19:16—26. Luke 12:13—21. 16:1—15.) Timothy must therefore charge the rich, as well as the poor, "to trust in the living God," both for present safety, support, and comfort, and for eternal happiness; remembering that he gave them bountifully all the things which they enjoyed; and in order to their thankful enjoyment of them. (Marg. Ref. l—o.) They ought therefore to acknowledge him as the Author of their abundance: it was all given them in his wisdom, revocable at his will, and could only be profitable to them when used to his glory. (P. O. Deut. 8:) They must therefore be earnestly exhorted and warned, by the authority of God himself, "to do good" with their riches, and to count this their duty and happiness; instead of avariciously hoarding, or luxuriously wasting them. By relieving the wants of the indigent, and largely contributing to the support and comfort of their poor brethren, and by other pious and charitable actions, they must aim to be "rich in good works," the genuine fruits of faith and love. (Notes, Jam. 1:9—11. 2:5—7.) They must be prompt and liberal in distributing their wealth to proper objects, and for valuable purposes; as the husbandman scatters his seed without grudging, in hopes of a future harvest. (Notes, Ec. 11:1—6. 2 Cor. 9:6,7.) Thus they would treasure up "for themselves" (not for their heirs, or they knew not whom, as misers do their idolized wealth,) the true riches, and lay "a good foundation" for their hope and comfort, in the approaching season of affliction and death; showing their faith in Christ, (the Rock of salvation,) by the unequivocal fruits of love and obedience: that so they also might "lay hold on eternal life" now in lively hope, and at length in actual possession; (Notes, 11,12. Matt. 7:24—27. 1 Cor 3:10—15.) when the self-indulgent, the covetous, and ungodly rich men around them, would "lift up their eyes in hell, being in torments." V. 20, 21. The apostle, considering the snares and temptations, the allurements and terrors, which Timothy had to guard against and overcome, in order to the faithful fulfilment of his ministry; and reflecting also on the various species of false religion, which many artfully substituted instead of the humbling, holy gospel of Christ; again most affectionately and earnestly called upon him to keep inviolable, without shrinking or wavering, the stewardship, or deposit with which he had been intrusted. And he warned him to shun the "profane and vain babblings" of those who wanted to impose on Christians the foolish and frivolous traditions and observances of the Jewish scribes, as well as the rites of the Mosaic law. He must turn away from "the oppositions of science," or knowledge, "falsely so called," such as those, with which the Gnostics, or knowing ones, afterwards corrupted the gospel. These speculations were borrowed from the vain philosophy of the Gentiles; and being distorted and mutilated, to suit their purpose, men introduced them into Christianity; to render it more congenial to the heart of man: and especially to gratify their fondness for disputation, and pride of superior penetration and acuteness. Thus, one corrupt system of boasted knowledge was opposed to another; jangling controversies were multiplied and perpetuated; the truth was obscured and overlooked; and the wildest absurdities were substituted in its place. Some, even then, having been seduced into these speculations, had "erred from the faith" into fatal heresies; and the evil was likely to increase

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. It is most important to the honour of the gospel, that professed Christians should duly perform their various relative duties; and that "servants count their own masters worthy of all honour," even though they be unbelievers. Their condition indeed, in this favoured land of liberty, allows them to change one situation for another: but the precepts of Scripture do not at all permit them to behave with disrespect to the persons, or disregard to the lawful commands of those whom they serve: nor yet to return affronting answers, or to speak of their master's faults to others without cause; but rather to weep over them and pray for them in secret, when they are ungodly and unreasonable. Alas! how grievously are "the name and gospel of God blasphemed," through those servants who love to discourse and dispute about doctrines, and sermons, in families averse to such subjects: and then behave with impertinence in their places, if not with sloth, dishonesty, and unfaithfulness! Thus thousands are fatally prejudiced against the gospel. Nay, this is so little attended to, that many masters, who would be glad to have pious servants, and to behave to them like brethren, as far as it is consistent with domestic subordination, are often wearied out, and tempted to prefer servants who know not the gospel, and are regardless of religion, because of the misconduct of many who profess it. Indeed, some servants whose sincerity is unimpeached, through a lamentable mistake, suppose equality in religious privileges, to imply equality in the family: and thus they act as if they "depised their believing masters" and their authority; giving them rude answers, and either neglecting their business, or doing it in their own way; as if this was a part of their Christian liberty! Whereas they ought to honour and serve them, with the greater diligence and alacrity; because "they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit." No doubt there are violations of duty, equally inexcusable, committed by those who stand in the opposite relation; and zealous professors of evangelical doctrines are accessary to believing servants choosing to live in irreligious families, by behaving in so unchristian a manner to such as have come among them, expecting better treatment.—Ministers are bound to teach and enforce the duties of all ranks and orders of men, in the church and the community: and "if any one teach otherwise," and speak contemptuously of these exhortations, and consent not to "salutary words," which are indeed the words of our Lord, and a part of "the doctrine according to godliness;" he ought to be deemed "a proud man, who knoweth nothing," whatever his gifts and profession may be; and he should be pitied and shunned, as a distempered man, who is infected by the love of abstract "questions, and strifes about words; whereof cometh envy, contention, reviling, evil surmises, and perverse disputing." This is manifest from daily observation: to these things "men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth," are peculiarly addicted; especially when they can make them subservient to their emolument and reputation, being disposed to think that the best religion, by which they can get the most money or worldly advantage in one form or another. Instead of engaging in controversy, with such mercenary, self-wise, and ignorant wranglers, who will not consent even to the apostle's words, or to those of Christ himself; we should withdraw from them, and thus protest against them, and leave them to dispute by themselves or with one another.

V. 6—12. We ought always to remember, "that godliness with contentment is great gain." As "we brought nothing with us into the world, and can carry nothing out;" let us trust him, who has hitherto provided for us, to supply our wants during the remnant of our pilgrimage. "Having food and raiment," we should daily beg of God, that we may be contented with it; and that he would keep us from every degree and kind of covetousness.—We cannot look about us at all, without perceiving that "they who will be rich, fall into temptation," are entangled "in a snare," "and are overcome by many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. "For the love of money is the root of all" kinds of "evil," in every part of the earth. Even among those who profess much to value the gospel, we often see piety, charity, mercy, equity, sincerity, temperance, and humility, laid like so many bleeding sacrifices on the altar of Mammon; while men's own souls, and those of their ill educated children are destroyed to gratify the malignant demon! Many hopeful persons, by allowing themselves to covet something greater, more elegant or affluent, have "erred from the faith," have "made shipwreck" of their religious profession, or have turned out mere thorny-ground hearers; and others "have pierced themselves through with many sorrows," to the imbittering of all their future lives. No words can express, no description reach, the numberless and horrid evils which continually flow from this source; especially in a day of outward prosperity, extensive commerce, lavish expense, and loose profession! But, "what is a man profited, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"—Let every Christian flee from this destructive lust: let "the man of God," especially, avoid every appearance of "the love of filthy lucre," or improvident expense: let us on the contrary, "follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness," with that assiduity and earnestness, with which worldly men pursue perishing riches: let us fight the noble and profitable fight of faith, and thus "lay hold on eternal life, to which we also are called;" and strive to act consistently with that good profession, which, in our ministry we have made of the truth, before many witnesses; who wil at last testify against us, if we "forsake Christ from love o this present world."

V. 13—21. The apostle charges each one who minister in holy things, and not Timothy alone, as "in the sight o God who quickeneth all things, and of Christ Jesus who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession; that we keep the commandment of God, without spot and unrebukable, till the appearing of Jesus Christ." Let none suppose, that "our Lord delayeth his coming." In his own times, he will be manifested, as "the Effulgency of the divine glory, the Image of the invisible God." This will be brought to pass by "the blessed and only Pontentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality, dwelling in inaccessible light," and invisible to human eyes. In order that we may be "presented faultless before" the divine Redeemer's "presence, with exceeding joy," receive the crown of glory, and be admitted to the beatific vision; it behooves us now to be faithful, watchful, sober, diligent, and disinterested. Thus honouring our God here, and desiring to ascribe to him glory and power to eternity; he will honour us at last before the assembled universe. (Notes, Col. 3:1—4. 1 John 3:1—3. Jude 22—25.)—Ministers are required especially to instruct rich men in their peculiar duties: because they are numerous and important, and to charge it on their consciences, that they perform them: as well as to warn them of the peculiar dangers of their situation. While nature prompts us to desire connexion with them; it produces a reluctancy to that part of our duty which relates to them. Even modesty, timidity, gratitude, or supposed prudence, may warp us in this matter: a false apprehension of what may conduce to their best interest, that of our religious society, or of the church at large; and a fear of prejudicing and offending them, and so losing the opportunity of doing good to them, or by them, may easily mislead us in this great concern: not to speak of the dread of their frown, and the credit and advantage of their friendship; both which are very ensnaring to the ministers of the gospel. But we must break through all these obstacles, if we would be faithful stewards and vigilant watchmen, and "deliver our own souls." We must "charge them in the name of God not to be high-minded, nor to idolize, or at all to trust in uncertain riches;" and not to seek happiness from them, but from the "living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy." We must show them the danger to which they are exposed, of being betrayed into pride, avarice, ambition, self-indulgence, and the love of outward splendour. (Note, Matt. 19:23—26. P. O. 23—30.) We must point out to them the proper use and improvement of their wealth; charging them to "do good, to be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate:" we must call on them to provide against the time to come, when it will be said to them, "Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward." (Note, Luke 16:1—8. P. O. 1—13,19—26.) We must exhort them so to use present advantages, that they may "lay up for themselves" a better treasure, and ensure a good hope, and know themselves to have a firm foundation, in a dying hour, "that they may lay hold on eternal life."—But, "who is sufficient for these things?" Or who can give such charges with energy, that is not himself evidently superior to the love of wealth, or any thing which wealth can purchase? May the Lord help us all to "keep these things, which are committed to our trust," to "avoid profane and vain babblings," disputations, philosophy, "and oppositions of science falsely so called;" by which so many are drawn away from a believing dependence on a crucified Saviour, and from preaching the doctrine of the cross to others, with faithfulness, and earnestness, and effect. —May the time speedily come, when all bishops shall give such charges to their respective clergy, as holy Paul gave to his son Timothy: and when all who consecrate or admit them to that most responsible office, shall charge them as the apostle charged Timothy in this grand concern.—And may the grace of the Lord Jesus be with all his faithful ministers and people every where, and at all times! Amen.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TIMOTHY.

THE apostle was evidently a prisoner at Rome when he wrote this epistle: but some suppose that it was written during his first imprisonment, as the epistles to the Ephesians, the Philippians, the Colossians, Philemon, and the Hebrews were. Others, however, are of opinion, that it was written when he was imprisoned a second time, and not long before he suffered martyrdom: and this appears to me by far the most satisfactory.—'The ancients from these words . . . "I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand," (4:6.) do generally conclude, that this was the last of Paul's epistles. . . . And truly the words of the apostle . . . are not well capable of any other sense; for he says expressly, (4:6.) . . . "I am now offered, and the time of my dissolution is instant. I have finished my course, and henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of glory." (8) Whereas he not only expected to be delivered from his first bonds, but says expressly, "I know that I shall abide, &c." (Phil. 1:25,26. Philem. 22. Heb. 13:23.) . . . In his first bonds, he was in libera custodia, "in his own hired house, receiving all that came to him, none forbidding him." (Acts 28:30,31.) "His bonds were known in Cesar's palace, and to all others." (Phil. 1:13.)—Here he is in arcta custodia: so that Onesiphorus was forced to "inquire more diligently after him, that he might find him out." (1:17.) Again, he said before, "Many of the brethren in the Lord, being encouraged by my bonds, were bold to speak the word more abundantly without fear." (Phil. 1:14.) Here, "all men forsake him." (4:16.)' Whitby.—Timothy was with Paul when he wrote to the Philippians, to the Colossians, to Philemon, and to the Hebrews. (Phil. 1:1. Col. 1:1. Philem. 1. Heb. 13:23.) Mark was also with him, and joined in saluting the Colossians; but both were absent when this epistle was written. (4:11.)—Should it be argued, that they came to him before he wrote the other epistles; what can be said concerning Demas? For he was with the apostle when he wrote to the Colossians, but had forsaken him when he wrote this epistle. (4:10. Col. 4:14.) The supposition, that Timothy and Mark had come to the apostle, before he wrote the other epistles, implies that this was written a considerable time before those: but the assumption, that Demas had repented, and returned to the apostle, when he wrote to the Colossians, implies, that the epistle to Colossæ was written some time after. Yet, these contradictory suppositions must both be admitted, to support the opinion, that this epistle was written during the apostle's first imprisonment. Indeed, the language used in it, implies that the apostle considered himself as one who had finished his ministerial labours, and after a severe imprisonment, perhaps for some time longer, was about to close his testimony by martyrdom. (Notes, 1:15—18. 4:6—8.)—It is also questioned, where Timothy was when the apostle wrote to him. It is generally thought that he resided at Ephesus: and indeed this is probable, though not certain. (Compare 2.16—18. 4:14. with 1 Tim. 1:20. See Notes, 4:9—13.19—22.)—It was evidently the scope of the epistle to animate Timothy to endure persecutions with courage and constancy: to caution him and others against false teachers and corrupt professors of Christianity; the increase of whom, the apostle predicted in most energetical language; and to direct and animate him in fulfilling his ministry, and in following after holiness.—'The apostle had been for some time under close confinement at Rome, at the mercy of a cruel and capricious tyrant. He had seen himself deserted by his friends, in his greatest extremity, and had nothing before him, but the certain prospect of being called to suffer death, in the same cause to which he had devoted his life. In this situation, how does he behave? Does he seem to look back with concern on his past conduct; or to regret the sacrifice he had made of his worldly interests? Can we discover any thing that betrays a secret consciousness of guilt, or even a suspicion of the weakness of his cause? Nay, does he drop a single expression, that can be interpreted as the mark of fear, or discomposure of mind, in the apprehension of those gloomy scenes that lay before him? Surely, if he had been an impostor, or had entertained the least doubt of the doctrines he taught, something of this kind would have escaped him when writing to a friend, with whom he could intrust all the secrets of his breast.—On the contrary, upon the most calm and deliberate survey, he expresses an entire satisfaction, in reflecting on the part he had acted; and earnestly recommends it to his beloved pupil, to follow his example, in maintaining the glorious cause, even at the hazard of his life. He appears throughout the epistle to have felt a strong conviction of the truth of those principles he had embraced; and glories in the sufferings he had endured in support of them; triumphing in the full assurance of being approved by his great Master, and of receiving at his hands a crown of distinguished lustre.' Doddridge.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle affectionately salutes Timothy with thanksgiving and prayer, 1—3, and expresses a great desire of seeing him, 4; remembering his faith, and that of his grandmother and mother, 5. He exhorts him to stir up the gift of God which was in him, 6. He charges him not to be ashamed of the divine testimony, or of him, the Lord's prisoner; but to prepare for suffering; as having been saved, and called by the grace of God, according to the gospel, which fully reveals life and immortality, 7—10. Of this, Paul had been made an apostle; for which cause he suffered, without being either ashamed or afraid, as he knew the power of him in whom he trusted, 11, 12. He exhorts Timothy to steadfastness and faithfulness, 13, 14; shows that those of Asia had turned from him, 15: and commends the diligent and courageous kindness of Onesiphorus; praying fervently that he and his family might find mercy from God at the last day, 16—18.

PAUL, [a]an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to [b]the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus,

2 To [c]Timothy, my dearly beloved son: [d]Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1. The gospel, intrusted to the apostle by the will and appointment of God, was according to "the promise of life" and salvation, made from the beginning, to fallen man, through the predicted Messiah: (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) all the prophecies to this effect were fulfilled in Christ; and then the promise of life was sent to Jews and Gentiles without distinction. (Marg. Ref. Note, Rom. 15:8-13.)—'Adam brought the sentence of death upon us all, and the promise of deliverance from that death is only made to us, through Jesus Christ, by virtue of that death which he suffered in our stead.' Whitby.—'Thus he shows, that the gospel is not new; but the very thing which God promised by the prophets. . . . I would again and again admonish the reader, not to pass over the superscriptions to the epistles of Paul, in a slight manner; as he uses in them, with a sort of inimitable brevity, to embrace the sum of the mystery of the gospel; so that while these are preserved, the church possesses that which shall may oppose to all heretics.' Beza.

V. 2. Marg. Ref. Note, 1 Tim. 1:1,2.

V 3—5. The apostle returned hearty thanks, on Timothy's account, to the one living and true God, whom he worshipped after the manner of his pious progenitors in successive ages, from Abraham to that time; or, according to the revelations of a Saviour vouchsafed to them. (Note, Acts 24:10—21. 26:4—8.) For indeed they all looked forward to the Messiah, and served God with a believing regard to him: though their descendants had rejected and crucified him, and now persecuted those who believed in him. The apostle had indeed formerly been a leader of these persecutors; but his "conscience was" now "purged from dead works" by the atoning blood of Christ, and made tender and well informed by divine grace: so that "he served God with a pure conscience" and cheerfully, with spiritual worship and believing obedience. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) He was especially thankful, that he was excited and enabled continually to remember Timothy, in his fervent and frequent prayers, by night and by day: being mindful of the tears which Timothy shed, as expressive of his love and sorrow, when they last separated; and longing greatly for another interview, which, he was assured, would fill his own heart with joy and satisfaction

6 Wherefore [r]I put thee in remembrance, [s]that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee [t]by the putting on of my hands.

7 For God hath not given us [u]the Spirit of fear; [x]but of power, and [y]of love, and of [z]a sound mind.

8 Be not thou therefore [a]ashamed of [b]the testimony of our Lord, nor of me [c]his prisoner: but [d]be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel [e]according to the power of God;

9 Who [f]hath saved us, and [g]called us with a holy calling, [h]not according to our works, but [i]according to his own purpose and grace, [k]which was given us in Christ Jesus [l]before the world began; [Practical Observations.]

This persuasion arose from his frequent recollection of "the unfeigned faith," which Timothy's whole conduct had manifested to dwell in him, and to influence and sanctify his heart. This was the same precious faith, which had first "dwelt in his grandmother Lois, and his mother Eunice." These pious women seem to have "waited for the consolation of Israel" before they heard the gospel, and thus were prepared to receive it; and having diligently given Timothy a religious education, it greatly conduced to his being made partaker of the same faith, as the apostle was fully persuaded concerning him. (Marg. Ref. h—q. Note, 3:14—17. Acts 16:1—3.)—It is not unlikely, that Timothy accompanied the apostle to Miletus; and parted with him there, accompanying the Ephesian elders, when they returned to Ephesus.

V. 6—8. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:11—16.) The spiritual gifts, conferred by the laying on of the apostle's hands, probably at Timothy's ordination ought to be diligently exercised, in the performance of the ministry intrusted to him; or the office itself may be intended. The apostle however reminded him to "stir up the gift of God that was in him," by meditation, prayer, and diligence; as the fire being stirred, or blown upon, is made to burn clearly and glow, though before it seemed expiring.—Thus love, zeal, and compassion for souls, being brought into vigorous exercise, Timothy would be animated to improve his talents, and fulfil his ministry, with ardour and effect. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) For the Holy Spirit, whom God gave to established believers as a Comforter, (Note, John 14:15—17.) was not the Author of a timid disposition, or of slavish fears. But, as "the Spirit of adoption," he inspired their hearts with holy courage and confidence, gave vigour and energy to spiritual affections, and endued them with strength for service or suffering: while love to Christ, his people, and all mankind, animated them to self-denying and perilous labours; and "a sound mind," a sober judgment and heavenly wisdom, led them to choose the noblest ends, and to pursue them in the persevering use of the most prudent and effectual means. So that the spirit of a lively Christian was that of courage, firmness, zeal, and wise consistency of conduct, in the midst of persecutions and temptations. (Marg. Ref. u—y. Notes, Rom. 8:14—17. Gal. 4:4—7. 1 John 4:18.)—Timothy was therefore exhorted "not to be ashamed" of that testimony, which he had borne to the Lord Jesus: nay, he must not hesitate to avow himself the fellow-labourer and dutiful son in the faith, of Paul the despised and imprisoned apostle of Christ. On the contrary, he ought willingly to become a partaker of those afflictions, which were to be endured for the gospel; depending for support, protection, and comfort under them, "on the power of God," which would certainly be exerted in his behalf. V. 9. The Lord had "saved" the apostle and Timothy, and their Christian brethren; or brought them into a state of salvation, having "called them with a holy calling;" as the Holy Spirit, by whom they were called, is the Author of all holiness; and as the gospel through which they were called, is of a most holy nature and tendency. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. Eph. 1:3—8. 1 Thes. 4:6—8. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) This calling had not been "according to their works;" for if God had dealt with them by that rule, they must have been left under condemnation: but it was "according to his own purpose, and grace which was given them in Christ before the world began:" that is, his purpose of giving them grace, in and through Christ Jesus, which was engaged to him, as the appointed Surety of his chosen people, "from eternal ages." (Marg. Ref. h—l. Note, Tit. 1:1—4.) Various ways of setting aside the obvious meaning of the verse, as implying personal election "from the beginning," or "before eternal times," have been proposed: but none of them can be maintained, as it appears to me; without supposing, that all who live and die impenitent and unbelieving, may nevertheless be said to be "saved and called with a holy calling;" because a Saviour was promised from the beginning of the world. Indeed, "the purpose of God" is expressly mentioned as the reason why they, rather than others, were thus "saved and called."

His own purpose.] Την ιδιαν προθεσιν. See on Rom. 8: 28.—Before the world began.] Προ χρονων αιωνιων. Tit. 1:2. See on Rom. 16:25.

V. 10. This "purpose of God," respecting the calling and saving of sinners, by grace given them in his Son, "before the world was," had at length been made manifest by his appearance in human nature; when, through his righteousness, atonement, resurrection, ascension, and mediation, he "abolished death," terminating his reign and dominion, and depriving him of his sting and terror, in respect of all believers; who might, through him, face that dreaded enemy in his most tremendous form, with comfort and confidence; being assured of the immediate entrance of their souls into glory, and a future triumphant resurrection of their bodies from the grave. (Marg. Ref. m—p. Notes, 1 Cor. 3:18—23. 15:50—58. 2 Cor. 5:1—8. Phil. 1:21—26. 3:20,21. 1 Thes. 4: 13—18. Heb. 2:14,15.) By the publication of the gospel, likewise, Christ "had brought life," spiritual and eternal, and a state of immortal felicity attainable by sinners, into full light; and had given the most explicit declaration of the nature and certainty of that future happiness, and of the way in which it may be obtained. (Marg. Ref. q.) Whatever notions and convictions any of the Gentiles had concerning the soul's immortality; they knew nothing of the way in which eternal life might be enjoyed by sinful man; they were wholly ignorant of the meaning annexed in the Scripture to the words, "life and immortality." Their speculations served only for amusement or disputation, being blended with error and fable, involved in obscurity and uncertainty, and utterly inefficacious on their practice. The Jews indeed had a revelation in the Old Testament, both of a future state, and of the resurrection of the body. But it was far less full and explicit, than that in the New Testament; it was chiefly confined to one small nation; and it was very imperfectly understood and believed, even in that one nation. (Note, Matt. 22:23—33.) So that whatever had been conjectured or believed, before the coming of Christ, concerning a future state; it might properly be said, that "he had brought life and immortality to light by the gospel:" the doctrine respecting it was placed in the most convincing and interesting light; every proper question about it was satisfactorily resolved; and the whole was suited to answer the most important practical purposes.—Indeed, after all modern improvements and supposed demonstrations; the influential belief of the immortality of the soul, and a future state of retribution, rests wholly on divine revelation; as well as that of the resurrection of the body, and the way of a sinner's acceptance. If indeed it can be demonstrated, that the soul is naturally capable of immortality; it certainly cannot be proved, except from immediate revelation, that Almighty God will not terminate its existence, especially as it is forfeited by sin; or that he will not make every transgressor miserable in immortality: for though immortality may be endless misery; but the gospel which expressly states this, (Note, Matt. 25:41—46. Mark 9:43—50.) also clearly connects "life," with "immortality," in respect of all who believe. (Note, John 11:20—27.) So that it should exceedingly enhance our value for "the oracles of God," when we clearly perceive the insufficiency of 'the oracles of reason,' in the most important of all concerns.

V. 11, 12. St. Paul had been "appointed a preacher, and an apostle," of the gospel, as before described, in order that he might proclaim "among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ," and instruct them in the way to immortal life and happiness. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, Luke 2:25—32. Acts 13:42—48. 26:16—18. Eph. 3:1—8.) But, instead of receiving honour and affluence, as a recompense for his labours, he suffered all kinds of injuries, and was then in a gloomy prison as a malefactor, continually expecting an ignominous death. He was not, however, in the least "ashamed" of having engaged, and spent so many years in the service of that Saviour whom men thus despised and hated: for he knew, by firmly believing the word of God, by divine teaching, and by happy experience, the power, faithfulness, and love of him, "whom he had believed:" and, as he could not doubt of his compassion and kindness, so he was fully persuaded of his authority and ability to take care of him in all events. He had "intrusted" his life, his soul, and his eternal interests, into the hands of Christ, as a precious deposit. He had discovered especially the value and danger of his immortal soul: he had been convinced that as he could not nimself, so none else in the universe could effectually deliver and secure it, through the trials of life and death; and that Jesus both could and would. He had therefore long before, and in habitual reliance and renewed and constant application to him from time to time ever since, "intrusted" it in his hands, by faith and prayer; to be washed, justified, and sanctified, and at last to be produced complete in holiness, and meet for glory. What he might pass through, by the way, he knew not: but he was "persuaded," that Christ was fully able to keep the precious deposit to that day, to which he continually had respect, as the grand accomplishment of all his hopes, when his beloved Lord would again 'appear in glorious majesty to judge the world.' (Marg. Ref. s—b.) His most important interests, therefore, being thus secured beyond the reach of all enemies; he was prepared to endure ignominy, pain, and death, without shrinking: hoping to commit his departing soul into his Saviour's hands, even as Jesus himself had commended his spirit into those of his heavenly Father. (Notes, Luke 23:44—49, v. 46. Acts 7:54—60, v. 60.)

V. 13, 14. After the above animating declaration of his own experience and joyful confidence, in the midst of sufferings and the near prospect of a violent death; the apostle exhorted his beloved Timothy to "hold fast," in a steadfast profession and by faithful preaching, "the form of sound words," the substance of evangelical truth, which he had heard of him: and of which perhaps he had given him some compendious epitome. This he must "hold fast in faith and love," by which the soul has communion with Christ, and receives communications from him; and so holds the truth in a vital and efficacious manner: and he must thus guard himself and others against the innovations which false teachers were introducing by unsound and specious words. (Marg. Ref. c—f.) "That good thing," the ministerial charge, or the gospel committed to his stewardship, Timothy was exhorted thus to retain, observe, and fulfil, without turning aside from it on any account: but he must do this "by the Holy Ghost, which dwelleth in us." In dependence on his sacred influences, sought by constant prayer, and by compliance with them. (Marg. Ref. g, h.)—'Adhering closely to the words and phrases, in which the apostle had taught the doctrines of the gospel. The teachers, in modern times, who, in explaining the articles of the Christian faith, use phrases different from the Scripture phraseology, would do well to attend to this apostolical injunction.' Macknight.

V. 15. The caution above given was the more needful for Timothy, as he must have heard, that "all they who were in Asia had turned away" from the apostle. Some understand this of those ministers and Christians, who were natives of Asia, professing Christianity, and had been with St. Paul at Rome; but who had shamefully deserted him in the season of his greatest danger. Others suppose the apostle to mean, that the churches in Asia, (or that district of which Ephesus was the metropolis,) had withdrawn their regard from him, being perverted by heretical teachers. (Notes, Rev. 2:1—7.) Some indeed interpret it of the Judaizing teachers; but those who had always openly opposed the apostle, could not be said to be "turned away from him." These, however, and other false teachers probably had succeeded in alienating many of the apostle's converts. Yet the first interpretation seems to be the true one, and is established by the context. (Note, 16—18.)—The expression, "Thou knowest," may only mean, 'No doubt thou hast heard:' and to mention two individuals of whom better hopes had been formed, to Timothy while resident in Asia, and witnessing the defection of many churches, would have been wholly unnatural. (Marg. Ref. Note, Acts 19:8—12.)

Be turned away from me.] Απεστραφησαν με. Tit. 1:14.

V. 16—18. Onesiphorus was, no doubt, an exception to what had before been said concerning those of Asia: and it is probable he resided at Ephesus, where his family then was; and that he had been at Rome, and still was at a distance from them. (4:19.) The apostle therefore prayed for them separately; (Marg. Ref. m.) because Onesiphorus, by his company and assistance, had greatly refreshed and enlivened his spirits, and had not been ashamed of being known to be his friend when he wore a chain, as many others had been. (Marg. Ref. n—q.) He had bestowed much pains to find out the place of St. Paul's confinement, and had at last succeeded. This shows that the apostle's imprisonment was far more close and severe than before; so that Christians in general scarcely knew where he was, and many of them were afraid to inquire after him. (Preface, Note, Acts 28:30,31.) He therefore prayed, that Onesiphorus might find mercy in the day of Christ: for Timothy "knew very well," in how many things he had served him at Ephesus, and ministered to his wants, and he had now proved the genuine constancy of his affection.—The eager manner, in which the Papists catch at the unfounded notion that Onesiphorus was dead, because the apostle prayed separately for his household, and yet afterwards prayed for him also: shows how entirely destitute their practice of praying for the dead is of scriptural proof; and how glad they would be to meet with some countenance for it in the word of God, if that could be done.—The Lord grant, &c. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The "promise of eternal life" to all who believe

CHAPTER II.

Timothy is exhorted to appoint faithful ministers; and to courage, diligence, fidelity, and patience, as "the good soldier of Christ," 1—7; in remembrance of Christ as risen from the dead, 8; in imitation of the apostle's example, 9, 10 and in assured faith and hope, 11—13. He must learn the flock against false teachers, and vain controversies; studying, as an approved workman, "rightly to divide the word of truth," 14—16. The pernicious effects of the error of Hymeneus and Philetus, 17, 18: yet "the foundation of God stands sure," and "all who name the name of Christ" should "depart from iniquity," 19. Some are vessels of honour, others of dishonour; but Timothy must seek to be the former, 20, 21. He is taught what to flee, and what to follow after, 22; to shun disputatious questions; and to instruct opposers with meekness, in hopes of their being recovered from the snare of the devil, 23—26.

THOU therefore, [a]my son, [b]be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus.

2 And [c]the things that thou hast heard of me among [d]many witnesses, [e]the same commit thou to [f]faithful men, [g]who shall be able to teach others also.

3 Thou therefore [h]endure hardness, as [i]a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

4 No man [k]that warreth [l]entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; [m]that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier.

5 And if a man also [n]strive for masteries, yet [o]is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully.

6 The [p]husbandman [q]that laboureth must be first partaker of the fruits.

7 [r]Consider what I say; [s]and the Lord give thee understanding in all things.

in Jesus Christ; is the leading subject in the preaching of those ministers, who are employed "according to the will of God:" and though outward dispensations vary; yet his real people have, in every age, substantially the same religion, and serve God after the manner of their forefathers and predecessors, "with a pure conscience;" being partakers of the same "grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ."—The tears of loving Christian friends, when separated at the call of duty, make way for their fervent prayers for each other; their earnest desires of meeting again on earth, lead to the cheerful hope of a blessed reunion in heaven, and the fulness of joy to which they will then be admitted; and their remembrance of the clear evidences of "unfeigned faith," which they have witnessed in each other, excite their thanksgivings to God for his grace bestowed upon them. (Notes, Acts 20:36—38. P. O. 32—38. 1 Thes. 1:1—4.)—The pious instructions and fervent prayers of believing parents, are often the means of conversion to their children: yet, such as enjoy this advantage should be reminded, that they will derive no benefit from "the unfeigned faith" of the nearest relations, unless the same dwell in them also. We ought to exhort those, of whom we have the best opinion, "to stir up the gift of God that is in them," and to occupy with it in the duties of the stations allotted them. —The new nature, communicated in regeneration, leads to true liberty, and victory over the fear of man, and of those reproaches, contumelies, and injuries which may be expected in the path of duty. Whenever, therefore, we find our hearts discouraged, our hands weakened, or our earnestness in the work of the Lord abated, we should ascribe it to the remains of unbelief and a carnal mind, and to the temptations of Satan: and we should strive the more fervently in prayer, for "supplies of the Spirit of Christ," to invigorate our faith and hope, to "shed abroad the love of God in our hearts," to animate us with zeal and holy affections, and to produce in us a sound mind and heavenly wisdom. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. Phil. 1:9—11.) Then we shall "not be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord;" but glory in it, even among his most scornful enemies; we shall not hesitate to join ourselves to his most despised and persecuted servants; and we shall willingly become "partakers of the afflictions of the gospel," in dependence on "the power of God" to support and comfort us.—In proportion as "the Spirit witnesseth with our spirits, that we are the children of God;" and "that he hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose, and grace, given us in Christ before the world began;" we shall feel ourselves "constrained by love" to devote ourselves and all our talents to his glory. Thus we shall manifest the holy nature of our calling; and of that doctrine which is so much opposed and perverted by the pride and carnality of the human heart.

V. 10—18. We should bless the Lord continually for "the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ," for what he has done and suffered to "abolish death," and for his gospel by which he has "brought life and immortality to light." As we have such decisive assurance of a future state, such full information concerning the nature of it, and so clear a prospect of immortal felicity, by faith in him "who is the Resurrection and the Life:" let us "give the more diligence," in making our personal interest in his salvation sure to our souls; and let such as are appointed to publish these important tidings to mankind, and to instruct the nations in the truths of Christ, prepare for sufferings; knowing that his most honoured servants have always been most conformed to him in this respect. If then we be despised and persecuted, for "this cause," let us not give place either to fear or shame: for he, "in whom we have believed," is able to bear us out, and to keep us safe "to that day," when he shall appear to perfect our felicity.—The hope of the meanest real Christian rests on the same basis with that of the greatest apostle. He too has learned the value and danger of his soul and eternal interests; and he intrusts them, by daily faith and prayer, in the Redeemer's hands, as the only security with which he can be satisfied. He too has "believed in him," and has some experience of his power, truth, and compassion: the answers which he has received to his prayers, and the change which has been wrought in his soul, increase and confirm his confidence; (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.) and thus he is "persuaded that the Lord Jesus will preserve him unto his heavenly kingdom," whatever dangers, trials, and enemies, he may meet with in his way thither.—In order to possess this good hope, we must adhere steadfastly to "the form of sound words," which the apostles have taught us: not only rejecting new notions, but new expressions; which are often employed to exalt one part of religion, by drawing the attention from others of equal importance. We must also be careful to hold even an orthodox creed "in faith and love which are in Christ Jesus:" this, as well as ministerial faithfulness, must be attempted "by the Holy Spirit which dwelleth in us:" and it will never be performed by those "who trust in their own hearts," and "lean to their own understandings."—We need not wonder that self-wisdom, and a contempt of the influences of the Holy Spirit, united with a dislike to the humbling truths of the gospel, and to bear the cross for Christ's sake, should turn so many, in these latter ages, from regarding the writings of the apostles; for similar causes turned many from them, even while the apostles were living, and confirming their authority and doctrine by the most undeniable miracles! But if others choose to follow the example of Phygellus and Hermogenes, let us copy that of Onesiphorus, by seeking out the afflicted servants of Christ, and refreshing and ministering to them; not being ashamed of their poverty or disgrace, though laid in dungeons or workhouses; and doing them all the good we can, with a constant affection, for the Lord's sake. Then shall we have an interest in their prevailing prayers; (Note, 2 Cor. 9:12—15. P. O. 8—15.) then we may thus hope for the mercy of God upon our families; and may rest assured of "finding mercy of the Lord in that day," when we shall most know its unspeakable value. And let those, who are thus comforted and relieved by their brethren, not be backward to acknowledge their obligations, or negligent in praying for them and all their connexions.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. The apostle next exhorted his beloved "son" Timothy, to be bold and zealous in preaching "the grace that is in Christ Jesus," for sinners; or rather to be strong in dependence on the grace of Christ. (Marg. Ref. a—b. Notes, 1:6—8. Hag. 2:3—5. 1 Cor. 16:13, 14. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Eph. 6:10—13, v. 10.) In order to preserve and diffuse the knowledge of the gospel among men, he directed him to commit those doctrines, which he had heard from him, concerning the Lord Jesus and his salvation, "among many witnesses," (or "by many witnesses," who all concurred in attesting them,) "to faithful men," established believers, and men fitted to be "faithful stewards," "who might be able to teach others also." This does not indeed prove, that the people had no concern in the appointment of their own pastors, or of ministers to preach the gospel in dark places: but it undeniably proves that Timothy had a superintending authority; and was empowered to take heed, that none should be appointed, except "faithful men who were able to instruct others also." It can scarcely be supposed, that there was any competition at that time. The apostles, and those sent by them, would doubtless select the most suitable persons; and the people would cordially acquiesce in the choice. (Marg. Ref. c—g. Notes, Acts 6:2—6. 14:21—23. 1 Tim. 5:21,22. Tit. 1:5—9.)—The communication of divine truth to mankind, by a succession of witnesses, from age to age, was thus effectually provided for.

V. 3—7. Timothy was again called on to consider himself as "a good soldier of Christ." (Notes, 1 Tim. 1:18—20. 6:11,12.) Having enlisted under his banner, he was bound to follow him and obey his orders: he must be ready to expose his life in the cause of the gospel, and at all hazards endeavour to promote it. As therefore soldiers, in actual service must expect great fatigues and hardships, as well as dangers; so he ought to be prepared for sufferings and difficulties of every kind. And as no man, who engaged in the military life, "entangled himself" with the management of husbandry or commerce, but left such employments to others, that he might be wholly at liberty to please the commander, under whom he served, and thus to obtain preferment and honour; so Timothy must not engage in secular business, or any of "the affairs of life," which might interfere with his pleasing Christ, who had chosen him to be his soldier, and was able abundantly to make up all losses to him.—It is plain, from the apostle's own example, that ministers may, on some occasions, earn their bread by labour: but this widely differs from seeking to grow rich by trade, or such employments as engross the mind and time, and introduce them into such connexions, and involve them in so many pecuniary engagements, as greatly endanger their own characters, and the honour of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—In the public games also, the man who strove for mastery, was not crowned victor, unless the contest had been managed according to the prescribed rules: it therefore behooved Timothy, and his brethren, to regulate their diligence and earnestness by the word of God; otherwise they could not expect the conqueror's crown. And as the husbandman must "first labour," before he partakes of the fruits of the field; so they must first diligently and patiently execute their ministry, before they receive the gracious recompense. This is the most obvious meaning of the verse: but it may signify, that the labouring husbandman must first be supported by the fruits of the earth, or he cannot perform his work; nor can the office of the ministry be duly exercised, except by those who live by faith in Christ themselves, as well as preach him to others. Timothy ought therefore well to consider these illustrations, and the Lord would give him understanding in all things pertaining to his work and circumstances.

V. 8—13. Amidst all dangers and sufferings, it behooved Timothy to "remember Jesus Christ," the promised Saviour, "of the seed of David, who had been raised from the dead." This, which is literal, seems the proper translation, for Timothy was not only called on to remember, and preach to others, the resurrection of Jesus; but all the sufferings which preceded this great event, his conduct under them, and the glorious termination of them, in his exaltation as our Prince and Saviour. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, Heb. 12:2,3.) This could not fail to suggest proper motives and encouragements to perseverance and constancy. For preaching that "gospel," which related to these great transactions, St. Paul was then "suffering trouble, as an evildoer, even unto bonds," and in prison: yet "the word of God was not bound," but was successfully preached by numbers; and he was well satisfied; nay, he exulted with joy. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, Phil. 1:12—18.) For he willingly "endured all things," which he was called to suffer, "for the elects' sake;" and in order to be an instrument in bringing them to "obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus," even complete deliverance from all evil, with the full enjoyment of "eternal glory." (Marg. Ref. b—e. Note, 1 Cor. 9:13—18.) Thus he at once sought their salvation and his own: for it was "a faithful saying," (probably in frequent use among Christians,) that if they were indeed "dead with Christ," to sin and the world, and ready to die for his gospel; they would assuredly live with him in that glory, which he entered on after his crucifixion and resurrection. (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, Matt. 16:24—28. P. O. 21—28. Notes, John 12:20—26. Rom. 8:14—17.) If they "denied him," from dread of sufferings and death, or any other carnal motive, and persisted in this denial, Christ would also "deny them," and leave them to perish with his enemies. (Notes, Matt. 10:32,33. Mark 8:38.) If they dared not to rely on his word, would not credit his testimony, or were unfaithful to him, they would ruin themselves; but he would still "abide faithful," according to his covenant engagements to his true disciples, and true to his word of executing vengeance on unbelievers. For "he cannot deny himself," or act contrary to his word, and his own essential and divine perfections, out of partial favour or weak compassion: so that it behooved them all to "hold fast the beginning of their confidence steadfast to the end." (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—Cannot. (13) Not for want of power, or liberty, but from perfect moral excellency.

V. 14—18. Timothy was expressly required to remind Christians and ministers of the important practical truths before stated: and to "charge them" most solemnly, "as in the presence of the Lord," not to strive and dispute about words, and those frivolous matters which the love of controversy magnified into important distinctions. These disputes could answer no good purpose: but, on the contrary, they tended to "subvert the hearers;" perplexing them about empty speculations, feeding their self-conceit and contempt of others, and drawing them off from the simplicity of faith and obedience. (Marg. Ref. n—r.) Timothy himself also must "studiously endeavour to approve himself unto God," in all his conduct and ministrations: he must bestow pains, that he might perform his ministerial services, "as a workman" who knew how to go about his business, and "needed not to be ashamed" of his performances, or afraid of having them most accurately examined. In preaching the gospel, he must "rightly divide the word of truth;" giving to every person his proper portion, according to his state, character, and circumstances. In this expression, the apostle is supposed by some to allude to the skill used by the priests and Levites in cutting in pieces the victims, and dividing them according to the legal prescriptions; and by others to refer to the conduct of those who carve for a large company, and are peculiarly careful that no one wants what is suitable for him. (Marg. Ref. s—x.)—To this conduct Timothy was required to adhere; and to "avoid the profane and vain babblings," to which many paid undue attention: (Note, 1 Tim. 6:20,21.) for, however frivolous they seemed, the apostle foresaw that they would "increase," and produce "more ungodliness" among men professing Christianity. For the words of such perverters of the truth, being of a poisonous nature, would imperceptibly diffuse their noxious influence, till they had eaten out the life and power of true religion; even as a gangrene, or a mortification, if not stopped, spreads in the human body, till it corrupts and destroys the whole of it. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) Of these vain disputers there seem to have been various descriptions; but the apostle mentioned Hymeneus and Philetus in particular, who had wandered far from the truth of the gospel: for they explained the doctrine of the resurrection in a mystical and allegorical manner; as if it meant the introduction of a new dispensation, or some moral change in men's characters, which were events in themselves, or in respect of Christians, already past; and thus they denied the future resurrection of the dead. (Notes, 1 Cor.

V. 19. Notwithstanding those apostacies and delusions by which many were ruined; it ought to be firmly believed, that "the Foundation of God standeth sure." Some have interpreted this of the doctrine of the resurrection, and others of election; but Christ himself, or the promise of eternal life to every one who believeth in him, is doubtless "the Foundation of God," which the apostle meant. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Is. 28:16. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) This "stands sure:" "the gates of hell cannot prevail against it," nor can any one who has truly built upon it, be fatally deceived. (Notes, Matt. 7:24—27. 16:18. 24:23—25.) According to the ancient custom, of sealing the foundation stones of magnificent structures, and engraving some inscription upon them; this mystical Foundation had the seal of God, and a double inscription upon it. On the one side it was engraved, as it were, for the believer's encouragement, "The Lord knoweth them that are his;" he knows his chosen: he approves, and takes special care of those whom he has called, and who are his believing and obedient people; he distinguishes the meanest of them from the most specious hypocrites; and he will preserve every one of them, while others are deceived and perish. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, John 10:14—18,26—31. Rom. 8:28—39. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—This is supposed by some to refer to the words of Moses, concerning Aaron and himself, in the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. (Num. 16:5.)—On the other side, this seal is engraven, for the admonition of all professed Christians, and to mark the characters and direct the conduct of true believers: "Let every one, that nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity." Thus men must seek the assurance of their calling and election; thus they must evidence the sincerity of their faith and love, and show their gratitude for distinguishing grace; thus they will best avoid the snares of deceivers, and mark the difference between themselves and every kind of hypocrites. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, Prov. 16: 6. Zech. 3:9,10. 2 Pet. 1:5—11.)

V. 20—22. Still further to show, that the heresies and apostacies of many professed Christians were entirely consistent with the engagements of God, by his covenant to true believers; the apostle observed, that in a great house, the habitation of some wealthy person, there were not only "vessels of gold and of silver," but others of baser materials; the former for honourable, and the latter for meaner uses. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Note, Rom. 9:22,23.) In like manner, in the visible church, not only true Christians and faithful ministers were found, as willing instruments in the honourable work of glorifying God, and promoting the good of men; but persons also of a different character, whose hypocrisy and iniquity were overruled, contrary to their intentions, to fulfil his righteous purposes, though to their own ruin and "everlasting contempt." (Notes, Matt. 13:24—30,36—43,47—50. 22:11—14. 25:1—4. John 15:2,6—8. 1 Cor. 11:17—22. 1 John 2:18, 19.) If then any man, but especially a minister of the gospel, carefully "purified himself from these" evil things, and simply adhered to the truth and will of God; he would be "a vessel of honour, sanctified and prepared" for the service of Christ, and ready to be his willing instrument "in every good work." (Marg. Ref. p—s.) The apostle therefore warned Timothy, not only to avoid false doctrines, but "to flee youthful lusts:" both the sensual indulgences, to which young persons are most liable; and also those impetuous passions, that rashness and love of novelty or controversy, and that desire of being distinguished, to which they are equally propense. And he exhorted him to pursue every holy temper, and diligently to practise every good thing himself, as well as to inculcate them on others: especially to "follow after peace with all those who called on the Lord out of a pure heart," or in sincere faith and love; notwithstanding their infirmities, and mistakes in matters of inferior consequence. V. 23—26. The apostle saw it necessary again to caution his beloved Timothy, against "foolish and unlearned questions;" such curious, presumptuous, or useless questions, as often appear to spring from a depth of discernment, reflection, and erudition; but which in fact are suggested by folly, and a want of solid acquaintance with the majesty of God, with man's true condition and character, and with other subjects of the highest importance. For these questions, which different persons would answer in contrary ways, would "engender" fierce and hostile contests, among proud and obstinate disputants, which would be managed with such acrimony and mutual revilings, or even injuries, that they might be called "fightings." (Note, Tit. 3:9.)—But, whatever Jewish or Gentile disputers did, "the servant of the Lord must not strive' in this manner, or with such weapons. (Note, 2 Cor 10:1—6.) On the contrary, he must be gentle in his address and conduct to all men, even to the most virulent and unreasonable opposers or perverters of the truth: he must be "apt" and ready to instruct men in the doctrines of Christ, with clear explanations, cool discussions, conclusive arguments and testimonies, pertinent illustrations, and kind language: at the same time he must patiently bear reviling, ridicule, cruel mockings, and other ill usage, without recrimination or resentment (Marg. Ref. b—g.) Thus in a meek, dispassionate, forbearing, and forgiving temper, he must continue to "instruct such as oppose themselves," however perverse and obstinate they are, provided they are willing to attend on the word still hoping that "God, peradventure, will give them repentance." This may be sometimes the case, even in respect of such as are at present most obstinate and contumacious; and then they will humbly receive and profess the truth, and depend on the mercy and grace of God in Christ, for pardon, assistance, and deliverance. (Marg. Ref. h—m.) And should this take place, the servant of God would reflect with remorse on the sharpness which he had shown towards those whom the Lord had mercifully borne with, notwithstanding themselves; [k] if God [l] peradventure will give them [m] repentance to the acknowledging of the truth;

26 And that they may [n] recover themselves [o] out of the snare of the devil, [p] who are [q] taken captive by him [r] at his will.

their provocations. He ought, therefore, rather to hope and wait for their coming to themselves, "awaking as from sleep," or recovering as men from intoxication; and so "escaping the snare of the devil," in which he had entangled them, by his artful devices and suitable temptations, even as fowlers draw the birds into a fatal snare. That so they might "recover" their liberty; though they had been taken captive by Satan, as prisoners are after a battle, who may be disposed of at the victor's will; being consigned to death, to chains, or to slavery, as he pleases. For such men would remain entirely in the power of Satan; unless God should mercifully please "to give them repentance," and so effect their deliverance. (Marg. Ref. n—p.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Both the falls of some, and the good examples of others, should excite us to "be strong in the grace of Christ" and zealous in his cause.—None ought to be chosen or appointed to the sacred ministry, who are not "faithful men, and able to instruct others also;" and all concerned in this most important trust should be careful, to whom they commit the "stewardship of the mysteries of Christ:" for if they wilfully, negligently, or partially choose or ordain improper persons; they will be condemned for it "before many witnesses," however they here concealed their motives or excused their conduct. (Note, 1 Tim. 5:21,22.)—"The good soldier of Christ" must be ready, at his Captain's word, to venture into the most perilous situations, and to endure the most extreme hardships. He ought therefore to be self-denying and courageous; one who loves his Leader, and is very zealous in his cause; and who firmly believes that he can make up all losses to him, even the loss of his life, which no other prince or general can do for his soldiers. It is highly desirable that those, who are engaged in this "holy warfare," should be exempted from the necessity of attending to secular business: but all, who would please their Lord, must avoid whatever is not absolutely necessary, and every thing which is "entangling."—While numbers wholly disregard these rules; some, who are active, and seem "to strive for the mastery," are not careful to "strive lawfully:" for they either spend their zeal about outward forms, human inventions, and doubtful disputations; or they use unsanctified weapons, furnished by bigotry and resentment; or those which involve a measure of duplicity and dissimulation.—We should also labour in patience and hope, assured "that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not," without vainly expecting to receive our reward, till we have given proof of our persevering diligence. (Note, Gal. 6:6—10.)—In all our hardships, conflicts, and temptations, we must "remember the Lord Jesus," and meditate daily on his sufferings, his resurrection, and his subsequent glory. Thus we shall learn to expect trials, and be the less disquieted "if we suffer trouble as evildoers, even unto bonds;" knowing that no power can bind the word of God, or prevent the success of the gospel, when he sees good to prosper it. And, if "the mind of Christ" be in us, we shall be willing "to endure all things for the elects' sake," and to promote the salvation and eternal glory of those chosen ones, for whom Christ willingly laid down his life. (Notes, John 10:14—18. 11:49—53. Rom. 5:6—10. Phil. 2:5—8. Heb. 12:2,3.) 'It is a faithful saying," that if we be thus "dead with Christ, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him." But he will deny, before his Father's throne, those who deny him before men; and his truth as much ensures the unbeliever's condemnation, as the believer's salvation; for "he cannot deny himself;" and "heaven and earth shall pass away, but his word shall not pass away." (Note, Matt. 24:32—35. P. O. 29—35.)

V. 14—18. Ministers must "charge" their flocks "before the Lord," with great solemnity and earnestness, "not to strive about words," or the Shibboleths of a party: (Note, Judg. 12:1—7.) which tend to no profit, but rather "to the subverting of the hearers." In performing this part of our duty, we shall be likely to give much offence: for eager controversy is exceedingly agreeable to the vitiated taste of the carnal mind, which loaths plain practical instruction. We should therefore "study to show ourselves approved unto God," and to obtain his seal to our ministry: we should bestow pains, to become skilful, as well as faithful preachers; "workmen that need not be ashamed;" instructers, who "know how rightly to divide the word of truth," and to give every man the portion which belongs to him, with close application to his heart and conscience. (Note, Matt. 24:45—51.) This will lead us to a distance from "profane and vain babblings, which continually increase to more ungodliness:" for many a specious error is allowed, without notice, to be privily brought in among professed Christians, which gradually eats like a gangerene, and destroys "the power of godliness" in an imperceptible manner. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:31—34. Gal. 2:1—5. 5:7—12. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.)—Scarcely any thing has done more mischief within the church, and among those who retain a regard for the Scriptures, than the manner of "Hymeneus and Philetus," in allegorizing away its plain doctrines and precepts, and so causing them to evaporate in some visionary mystical notion. This some call spiritualizing; but it well answers the purpose of deceivers, though often used by well-meaning injudicious persons. It exeites the wonder of the ignorant, and the disgust of rational men: and thus it takes off the one from the substantial part of religion, to amuse themselves with fancies; and it increases the prejudices of the other against evangelical truth. Nothing can be so crude, so foolish, or so evidently erroneous, but it will subvert the temporary faith of some professors of the gospel: for of all the numberless delusions, which have been or may be invented, there is not one, but is more congenial to the pride and lusts of men, than the simple truths of the holy Scriptures. (Note, John 8:41—47.)

V. 19—26. Amidst all heresies, schisms, and apostacies, "the Foundation of the Lord standeth sure." Secure and happy are they who build on it by an obedient faith! He knows them as his own people; and they may know this of themselves, by diligent care to "depart from iniquity," and to honour the name of Christ in a holy conversation. These are the "vessels of gold and silver," which the Lord has "before prepared unto glory," whom he has "sanctified and made meet for his own use, and ready for every good work:" and when "the vessels of dishonour" shall be consigned to destruction, these will be "filled with all the fulness of God." Let us then, in dependence on the promises of God, and diligent attendance on every means of grace, "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit:" let young Christians and ministers "flee youthful lusts:" let all "follow after righteousness, faith, love, peace, with all them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart:" and let the frequent repetitions of the apostle teach us the immense importance of avoiding foolish, curious, and frivolous questions, and whatever can produce strifes and angry controversies. Alas! how little it has been remembered that "the servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle towards all men, apt to teach, patient!" Numbers seem to think that the reverse should be his character and conduct; and that zeal for doctrinal truths is incompatible with gentleness, meekness, patience, and love. This predilection for controversy, both in teachers and hearers of the gospel, is one grand hinderance to our "recovering sinners out of the snare of the devil;" for to exasperate opposers is by no means the way to convince them.—The artful enemy of our souls knows how to bait his hook and spread his net for men, according to their different tastes, humours, and situations. He conceals the danger, and allures them with the prospect of honour, gain, or pleasure. They do not suspect the deception till they have swallowed the bait, or are caught in the net: then they are "taken captive by him at his will;" and they sometimes appear under a kind of necessity of proceeding in their ruinous courses. Yet, some are "recovered out of the snare:" for when "God gives them repentance," they come to themselves, they "acknowledge the truth," they confess their guilt: they cry for mercy and deliverance, they obtain pardon and grace; they are set at liberty, and "walk in newness of life;" and Satan can never more regain his dominion over them. (Notes and P. O. Luke 15:11—24.) There is no "peradventure," in respect of the readiness of God to pardon those who do repent; but we cannot tell whether he will "give repentance" to those who still continue to oppose his will: yet, as he sometimes grants it even to the most obstinate of his enemies, it is our duty to hope and pray for them, and "in meekness to instruct them," as long as we have the opportunity. And if any feel themselves "taken captive by Satan," and long for deliverance; let them remember, that they can never "recover themselves out of the snare of the devil," except by "acknowledging the truth of God" in the gospel, that this they never can do without repentance; that repentance is the gift of God; and finally, that they must ask it of him by earnest, persevering prayer.

CHAPTER III.

The apostle foretells grievous times, "in the last days," through the atrocious wickedness of those, who would retain "the form, without the power of godliness," 1—5; and the devices and opposition of false teachers, 6—9. He proposes his own example to Timothy, 10—13; exhorting him to continue in the faith, 14; and showing the excellency, authority, and sufficiency of the sacred Scrip ures which Timothy had known from his youth, 15—17.

THIS know also, that [a]in the last days [b]perilous times shall come.

2 For men shall be [c]lovers of their own selves, [d]covetous, [e]boasters, [f]proud, [g]blasphemers, [h]disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy,

3 Without [i]natural affection, [k]truce-breakers, [l]false accusers, [m]incontinent, [n]fierce, [o]despisers of those that are good,

4 [o]Traitors, heady, [p]high-minded, [q]lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God;

5 Having [r]a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: [s]from such turn away.

6 For [t]of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women [x]laden with sins, [y]led away with [z]divers lusts,

7 [a]Ever learning and never able to come to [b]the knowledge of the truth.

8 Now [c]as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also [d]resist the truth: [e]men of corrupt minds, [f]reprobate concerning the faith.

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—5. The apostle foresaw, and foretold to Timothy, and so to the church in that and in all future generations, that "in the last days," or under the Christian dispensation, chiefly in the latter ages, "perilous" or grievous times would arrive; in which it would be extremely difficult for Christians to escape the contagion of bad examples and corrupt principles; or for ministers to preach the unadulterated truth of the gospel; and in which those who retained their integrity would be exposed to the hatred and persecution of their professed brethren. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Is. 66:5,6. Rev. 11:7—12. 13:5—17. 17:6.) For, while the love of Christ, of one another, and of all men, distinguished real Christians; a race of nominal Christians was about to arise, who would in general "be lovers of their own selves," in a carnal, inordinate, and exclusive manner, being "covetous" and greedy in getting and keeping wealth at any rate, and idolatrously trusting in it. They would be vainglorious "boasters," and "proud" of their genius, learning, sagacity, and supposed merits: "blasphemers" of the perfections, truths, and ways of God; "disobedient to parents;" "ungrateful" to God, and to earthly benefactors; "unholy" and profane; destitute of "natural affection" to parents, or "children;" "truce-breakers," ready to violate promises and covenants, being unfaithful to every trust reposed in them; "false accusers of others," in order to find a pretence for persecuting them; given up to the excessive indulgence of their appetites: "fierce" and savage in their tempers; not loving, but "despising, good men" and good things; "betrayers" of those who trusted them; of a seditious and turbulent spirit respecting rulers; rash and impetuous; "high-minded;" haughty and imperious; and lovers of sensual or dissipated "pleasures, rather than lovers of God," delighting in these gratifications, and not in the Lord and his holy service. (Marg. Ref. c—q.) Yet, along with all these hateful vices, they would retain "the form of godliness," professing Christianity, attending on sacred ordinances, and appearing to be religious: while they renounced "the power of godliness;" and at least practically denied, that it ought to have any sanctifying influence on their affections, tempers, and conduct. (Marg. Ref. r, s.) From persons of this character Timothy was directed "to turn away," and to have no fellowship with them.—We need not suppose, that the same individuals would answer to every part of this description: but men would arise, called Christians, who would be guilty of these vices; some being more notorious in one way, and some in another, even as the heathens were, and differing from them only in name. (Note, Rom. 1:28—32.)—Such persons have always been found within the visible church, in every place, and through all succeeding ages hitherto; and some even among those who have most zealously contended for the peculiar doctrines of the gospel. Many such were soon perceived in the primitive church; but things grew "worse and worse," (13) till the grand antichristian apostacy was produced. The selfishness, enormous covetousness, "high swelling words of vanity," and blasphemous claims and titles of the church of Rome, have generally been supposed to be pointed at, in an especial manner. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:3—12.) The practice of that church in counselling children to "disobey their parents," and parents to withdraw their natural affection from their children, in order the more readily to replenish religious houses with monks and nuns; their disregard of the most solemn leagues and covenants, and want of all faith and mercy towards those whom they falsely accused of heresy; their enmity against true Christians; the licentiousness countenanced by indulgences and dispensations; their fierce persecutions; their arrogant conduct towards princes and emperors, have certainly exceeded every other corruption of Christianity which has yet appeared: nevertheless, they have always maintained, and been very exact and pompous in their "form of godliness."—It is self-evident, that the apostle foretells what the state of things would be in the visible church, and among the professors and ministers of Christianity. No doubt, the Jews, just before the destruction of Jerusalem, answered in many things to the description here given; and so do numbers of nominal protestant Christians at this day. There was, however, no occasion to warn Timothy to "turn away from" persecuting Jews; but "the mystery of iniquity was already working," and it was necessary for faithful ministers to protest against it, in the most decided manner. V. 6—9. Even in the apostle's days there were such men as he had described; who, in a covert manner, and with subtle insinuation, crept into families, prying into their affairs, winding themselves into confidence, gaining ascendency over the consciences, and perverting the souls of the unstable, for their own interest or that of their party. These deceivers singled out the weakest and most credulous women; that they might take advantage of their want of information and disernment, to work upon their imaginations and passions. Their success was also chiefly among such "as were laden ith sins, and led away with divers lusts;" perhaps such, as efore they professed Christianity, had been addicted to ncentiousness; and not being renewed by divine grace, but merely restrained by temporary convictions, were ready to hearken to the flatteries and soothing delusions of false teachers, and to embrace a carnal, self-indulgent religion; which would at once give quiet to the conscience, and license to sinful passions. They were also such as were "ever learning," bestowing pains to become acquainted with religion, but running after every new teacher, and hearkening to every novel notion, continually shifting from one thing to another, and thus "never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." (Notes, Prov. 14:6. Rom. 16:17—20. 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Eph. 4:14—16.) These were the persons whom the false teachers first assailed; and, by their insinuations and flatteries, they reduced them into a kind of "captivity" to them; that by their means they might accomplish their covetous, ambitious, or licentious purposes. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:1—3,18—22. Jude 9—19.) Now as the Egyptian magicians (whose names were reported by tradition, and by some ancient writers, to have been Jannes and Jambres) withstood Moses, by counterfeiting his miracles: thus endeavouring to bewilder Pharaoh's mind, that he might not regard the message of JEHOVAH; so these false teachers withstood the truth, by deceiving men with a false gospel, and various lying pretences; being corrupt and depraved in their minds, alienated from the faith of Christ, and rejected of God, as folly shall be manifest unto all men, as theirs also was. [Practical Observations.]

hypocrites or apostates. But they would not be able to proceed any further in their opposition to the gospel, than the limits prescribed to them in the wisdom of God: and at length their folly would be published to all men, even to their most devoted adherents; even as that of the magicians was, when "the boil was upon them" as well as on the other Egyptians. V. 10—12. As a contrast to the base spirit of the deceivers before mentioned, the apostle reminded Timothy of his own conduct and ministry. He had indeed had full opportunity of knowing accurately the doctrine which St. Paul had preached in every place; "the manner" in which he had lived, the leading aim and "purpose" which he had pursued in the most determined manner; with every particular concerning his spirit, conduct, and ministry; he had fully considered these several particulars; and he had attained to a full acquaintance with them. (Note, 2 Cor. 6:3—10.) He had especially observed the patience with which he had endured persecutions in several places. It is highly probable that Timothy was converted to Christianity during the apostle's first progress through the cities of Asia Minor, and that he was an eyewitness of St. Paul's sufferings at that time. This satisfactorily accounts for his mentioning the persecutions which he endured at Antioch, Iconium and Lystra, rather than more recent ones which Timothy had not witnessed.—Antioch in Pisidia is evidently meant. (Notes, Acts 13:49—52. 14:5—7,19,20. 16:1—3.)—Indeed, it was a general rule, that if any man was determined to live a godly life, in dependence on the atonement and grace of the Lord Jesus, and according to his precepts, he would certainly be exposed to persecution. A "form of godliness," without any direct connexion with the doctrine of faith in a crucified Saviour: or a profession of that faith without the example of a godly life, might be endured and tolerated: but the open profession of "the truth as it is in Jesus," and a resolute attention to all the duties of vital godliness, would excite the scorn and enmity of mankind; nor could any abilities, wisdom, amiableness, or beneficence, secure a man from all the effects of their persecuting animosity.

V. 13. Instead of matters taking a more favourable turn, the apostle predicted, that "wicked men and seducing teachers" would grow more and more subtle, daring, callous, malicious, cruel, covetous, and ambitious; deceiving others, and being themselves deceived, by their own delusions, and by Satan's wiles. (Note, Ez. 14:9—11.)—The history of the Christian church, through all the subsequent ages, forms an awful demonstration, that he "spake as he was moved by the Holy Spirit:" so that all the declamations of infidels against the impostures, persecutions, wars, and massacres, occasioned by Christianity, are only so many attestations to the truth of the religion contained in the holy Scriptures, and in the profession and lives of a remnant through every age; and they bear against nothing but that spurious Christianity, which was long before predicted and condemned by the Spirit of prophecy.—The individual deceivers, whom the apostle had in the preceding verses described, would soon be put to shame, but others, succeeding them in the same course, would, from age to age, carry on a similar plan of deception, with more diabolical subtlety and iniquity; being themselves deceived by Satan, while employed by him to deceive mankind. (Notes, Rev. 12:7—12. 13:8—10. 19:17—21. 20:1—3.) The original word for "seducers," (γοητες,) signifies magicians, or enchanters, such as Jannes and Jambres had been; that is, men who, by lying pretences to miraculous powers, opposed that gospel which had been confirmed by real and indisputable miracles. (Note, 6—9.) Now it scarcely admits of a doubt, what company of men, since the apostle's days, have most exactly answered this description. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:8—12. Rev. 13:11—17.)

V. 14—17. The apostle, applying what he had before stated, called on Timothy diligently to maintain and persevere in the profession and preaching of that doctrine, which he had learned and assuredly believed; knowing that, through his ministry, he had received it from God himself; and remembering, that it accorded to the holy Scriptures, with which he had from his childhood been acquainted. These, when properly understood, were "sufficient to render him wise unto salvation," and to instruct him in all things pertaining to it; as they all spoke of the promised Messiah, and prepared the mind for receiving him by faith, and submitting to his authority. (Notes, Luke 24:25—31,44—49. John 5:39—47. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9,10.) For all the writings of Moses and the prophets were "given by inspiration of God," to instruct men in divine things: and every part of them was not only perfect truth, but "profitable," to teach them "sound doctrine," respecting God and themselves, the eternal state, the way of acceptance and of holiness, and other most interesting and difficult subjects; to "reprove" and convince them of their errors and sins, that they might learn their guilt and danger, and so value and embrace the remedy proposed; to "correct" and regulate their judgment, affections, and conduct; and to "instruct" them in every part of universal righteousness, with the obligations, motives, and encouragements to it. Thus they were suited and sufficient, not only to make the Christian "wise unto salvation," and to direct his whole behaviour, but to perfect "the man of God," (Note, 1 Tim. 6:11,12.) the faithful minister of Christ; and fully to supply him with knowledge and wisdom, and whatever could tend to his fitness for every good work, in his private conduct and public services.—Doubtless this is still more emphatically true of the sacred Scriptures, now the canon of the New Testament also is completed.—The Old Testament, almost entirely in its present form, was called by the Jews, "The Scriptures," or "The Oracles of God:" now, if every thing which Christ and his apostles spoke on the subject, was exactly calculated to confirm them in this opinion, and to discredit all traditional revelations; and if the apostle here expressly declares, that the whole was divinely inspired; what are they doing, who, as professed friends to Christianity, and holding the office of pastors, nay, rulers of the Christian church, labour to persuade men, that the books of Moses, and other parts of the Old Testament, are genuine and authentic indeed; but speak so ambiguously on the point of their being divinely inspired, as to leave their readers in general to suppose, that they do not believe them to be so; or that this is a matter of subordinate consequence? (Note, Rom. 15:4—7.)

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle solemnly charges Timothy, to be diligent and faithful in his ministry, 1, 2; as ere long, men "would not endure sound doctrine," 3, 4; and as he, Paul, had nearly finished his work, was about to suffer martyrdom, and received the crown of righteousness, 5—8 He presses Timothy to come to him, and to bring Mark with him, as he was almost left alone; and gives him information, direction, and caution, in several particulars, 9—15. He shows Timothy how his brethren had forsaken him, and how the Lord had supported him, when called to answer before his persecutors; expressing his confidence in God for the future, 16—18; and he concludes with salutations and benedictions, 19—22.

I [a]CHARGE thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, [b]who shall judge the quick and the dead [c]at his appearing and [d]his kingdom; continual influence of his new-creating Spirit.—We need not therefore, wonder, that even "in the last days," under the fullest external revelation, which God has made to man, "perilous times soon came:" and professed Christians became "lovers of themselves," lovers of money, of honour, "and of pleasure, rather than lovers of God." Our land at this day abounds with such nominal disciples of Christ, as are here described. Some are selfish and covetous; others proud boasters and blasphemers; many regardless of their duty to parents or children, relatives and rulers; being "unthankful and unholy." Very many are slanderous, treacherous, intemperate, licentious, profligate, "fierce," implacable, "despisers of good men, traitors, heady, high-minded:" and who can number those, "who are lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God?" Can any man seriously think that these crimes are less abominable in men called Christians, than they were in heathens? Can any one doubt, but that they will be more terribly punished? In fact, in proportion to the zeal and exactness, with which "the form of godliness" is retained, when "the power of it" is denied, the more criminal and dangerous men become, and the more should they be avoided and protested against. For when any form or notion of religion is made a cloak, or an excuse, or a compensation for wilful transgressions of the divine law; the danger becomes greater, than from men who openly cast off all regard to God. Hypocrisy, superstition, enthusiasm, and antinomianism, are infectious beyond other mental maladies: the poisonous draught is more dangerous, when so mingled as to resemble some valuable medicine; and "a wolf in sheep's clothing" is most dreadful to the unsuspecting flock. (Notes, Matt. 7:13—20.) Of this genus, (which is divided into various species, popish and protestant, ancient and modern, learned and unlearned,) there have ever been artful men, who have insinuated themselves, by pompous or plausible pretensions and flatteries, into the favour and confidence of the weakest, most credulous, most ignorant, and imaginative of the human species; and who have taken them captive, by soothing them into quietness, "when laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts." Those weak and deluded persons, who want a safe and comfortable religion, without self-denial, humiliation, and mortification of their lusts, "are ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth;" and readily fall in with artful and interested deceivers of any description. For "as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses," by aping his miracles, so do such men resist the truth by a counterfeit gospel; and by substituting visions, superstitions, or curious speculations, in the stead of repentance, faith, and holy obedience. Such delusions act like opiates; they lull the conscience into a soothing sleep, and increase the disease; and they are administered by men "of corrupt minds, who are reprobate concerning the faith," of whom all should beware. But, though it is grievous to perceive, that "evil men and seducers grow worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived:" we may yet rejoice that they cannot exceed their limits; that they cannot fatally delude the upright believer; and that at length, "their folly will be made manifest to all men," as that of their predecessors during a long succession of ages has uniformly been.

V. 10—17. In order to escape and expose every seduction, we ought to get well acquainted with the doctrine and example of the apostle; and to copy his "manner of life," his purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, and patience." Let us then frequently reflect on his persecutions, supports, and deliverances: let us count our cost, and know assuredly, that "if any man determine to live godly in Christ Jesus, he must suffer persecution" in one way or other; as far as Providence will permit the enmity of men's hearts to break forth against him. Let us "continue in the things which we have learned" and professed to believe, endeavouring to get further acquaintance with "the holy Scriptures, which are able to make us wise unto salvation, by faith in Jesus Christ," who is the principal Subject both of the Old and New Testament. And let us learn to reverence the whole Bible, as every sentence in it was "given by inspiration from God, and is profitable" to instruct, reprove, correct, and guide us in the way of peace and holiness. Nothing more can be wanting to render the Christian or the minister perfectly qualified for every service required of him, and "thoroughly furnished unto every good work;" than a complete, believing, experimental, and practical knowledge of the whole Scriptures, in their genuine meaning and connexion, and the relation and proportion of one part to another. All religious error springs from ignorance, perversion, or misunderstanding of the Scriptures; from overlooking, objecting to, or explaining away some part of them; or from adding men's notions, inventions, superstitions, or new revelations to them, as of equal or superior authority. The way therefore to oppose error, is by promoting the solid knowledge of the word of truth, especially by the faithful preaching of the gospel: and the greatest kindness which we can do our children, is to bring them early acquainted with the Bible.—Thus we shall do something important, which may tend to preserve religion in the world, when we are removed out of it; and to perpetuate a succession of those who are "established in the faith," "wise unto salvation, and thoroughly furnished unto every good work." (Notes, John 15:12—16. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) 'For it is evident, that the pious endeavours of Lois and Eunice, in bringing young Timothy acquainted with the holy Scriptures, laid the foundation of all his subsequent eminence and usefulness, in which he was inferior to none but the apostles. It is probable, that, while they were teaching the child to read, and treasure up in his memory, "the Oracles of God," they little thought what a harvest in future life would spring from the seed thus sown. But the Scripture warrants high expectations in this respect: and it may fairly be said, that the education of women in useful knowledge and genuine piety, in order that they might be qualified and disposed to instil good principles into the tender minds of children, would have the happiest effects towards reforming mankind, and diffusing the light of the gospel in the world.' Memoir of Rev. Jerem. Newell, annexed to his funeral sermon by the author.

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—5. These repeated, solemn charges of the apostle, to so zealous and faithful a minister as Timothy, most emphatically show how difficult it is to fill up this important office, in a proper manner, to the end of life, especially in dangerous times. Again he called on his beloved Timothy, by the authority, and as in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus, who was appointed to "judge the living and the dead," at his last glorious appearing to complete the design of his mediatorial kingdom, and to gather his saints into his heavenly kingdom; (Note, 2 Pet. 1:10,11,16—18.) that he should "preach the word" of God as one in earnest, being "instant" and unwearied in his work "in season, and out of season," at stated times and occasionally; when the opportunity was more favourable, and when it was less so; to large congregations, in private circles, in obscure places, before friends, or enemies, to one, or to ten thousands of hearers; when it might be done with safety and credit, and when it exposed him to hardship, reproach, peril, or loss. Timothy, to whom this exhortation was given, had an infirm constitution; so that this excuse for remissness should not be too readily admitted. (Note, 1 Tim. 5:23.)—In thus preaching the word of God, he was charged to "reprove," with authority, the sins and negligences of professed Christians; to "rebuke" with sharpness those who were guilty of gross evils; and to "exhort," persuade, and beseech his hearers to attend to every part of the divine message, with the obedience of faith. (Notes, 1 Thes. 5:12—15. Tit. 2:15.) In this he was to persevere "with all long-suffering," though many should prove unruly, ungrateful, or slow to understand his instructions; and he must enforce his exhortations, by explaining, and applying the doctrines of the gospel, in the simplest and most convincing manner. In these important services he ought to be the more assiduous; as the time was about to come, when professed Christians would not "endure sound doctrine," the faithful salutary truths and practical instructions of the divine word: but, being "led away with divers lusts," would be exasperated or disgusted by it: and desire a doctrine, which gave them no disturbance or offence, whilst they indulged their several inclinations. They would therefore seek for "teachers after their own lusts;" and they would "heap unto themselves instructers of this stamp;" being dissatisfied without a large number of them, to gratify their love of novelty and variety, and to keep them in countenance in their delusions. Thus "their itching ears" would be humoured and pleased; they would "turn them away from the truth," with contempt and disgust, and pay all their attention to cunningly devised fables, and specious heresies. To oppose the progress of this corrupt leaven, which was even then beginning to work, Timothy was called upon to be "vigilant in all things," and to shun all pursuits, which might prevent him from watching against the fallacies, with which Satan and his servants would, in varied ways, endeavour to seduce men from the simplicity of Christ; (Notes, Matt. 13: 36—43. Acts 20:29—31. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.) to endure cheerfully all the afflictions, to which his zeal and faithfulness might expose him, from false brethren, or avowed enemies; to perform "the work of an evangelist," in the several places to which he might have access; and to "make full proof of his ministry," by trying to the uttermost every method of doing good to the souls of men, in the exercise of all its duties.—Timothy is said in the postscript, to have been 'ordained the first bishop of the church of the Ephesians;' but it seems, to me at least, that the office of an evangelist was superior to that of a diocesan bishop, as exercised in the earliest ages of Christianity. Those, however, who think otherwise, and consider Timothy as a bishop, should not forget the apostle's charge to bishops, to "preach the word, instant in season, out of season." For this too many seem to disregard. The evangelists appear to have been extraordinary assistants to the apostles, exercising great authority in their absence over the several churches which they visited: perhaps when that extraordinary office began to cease in the church, diocesan episcopacy was substituted; but it can only answer the same end in a smaller degree, and in one place; while the missionary part of an Evangelist's office continues essential to the promulgation of the gospel in every age. (Marg. Ref.) —'The twelve, after Christ's departure, had others whom they sent into some part of their charge.—These, when they were employed in preaching the gospel, to them that had not yet received it, the Scripture calls Evangelists.' Hammond. (Notes, Acts 21:7—14. Eph. 4:11—13.)

V. 6—8. It behooved Timothy to act with the greater vigilance and fortitude, as the apostle foresaw that he himself should shortly suffer martyrdom, and was even now, as it were, pouring out his blood as a drink-offering to the honour of the Lord. (Note, Phil. 2:14—18.) For this approaching event he was ready: and he knew the time was at hand, when he should be removed out of the world, as the sojourner takes up his tent and departs to another place. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—4. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) He considered himself as one who had "finished his ministry," and had only the concluding scene to pass through: and since the time when Christ had chosen him to be his soldier, he was conscious that he had "fought a good fight;" he had valiantly contended against sin, the world, and Satan; he had, at Christ's command, through labours, perils, and sufferings, sought the subversion of "the kingdom of darkness," the deliverance of Satan's captives, and the advancement of the kingdom of Christ: this he had done, with the appointed "weapons of his warfare;" by faithful preaching, a holy example, fervent prayers, and patient sufferings. (Notes, 2:3—7. 2 Cor. 10:1—6. 1 Tim. 6:11—12.) He had "finished his course." He had set out to run the Christian race, "laid aside every weight," "pressed forward" through every obstable to the mark, and was now about to seize the prize. "I have waited for thy salvation, O LORD." (Notes, Acts 20:22—24. 1 Cor. 9: 24—27. Phil. 3:12—14. Heb. 12:1. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) "He had also kept the faith" both in his profession, and in the execution of his important ministry. (Notes, 1:13,14. 1 Tim. 6: 20,21.) He therefore assuredly expected the "crown of righteousness;" that glory and immortality, which were prepared for all true believers in Christ, according to the measure of their grace, services, and sufferings in his cause. This the apostle knew had been "laid up for him," and he had now little more to do, than to receive and enjoy it (Notes, Matt. 25:34—40. Col. 1:3—8. 3:1—4. Heb. 10:32 34. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) "The righteous Judge" would openly award it to him "in that day," to which he constantly called men's attention: as a sinner, indeed, he merited condemnation according to the law; but as a believer, whose faith had been abundantly shown by his works, he was entitled to "the reward of righteousness," according to the gospel. He expected "when absent from the body, to be present with the Lord," and to have abundant and satisfying pre-libations of his complete felicity, in the company of "the spirits of just men made perfect:" but the public declaration of his right to the conqueror's crown, and his admission to the full enjoyment of immortal glory, would be reserved for that day, when Christ shall appear to show his righteousness, as well as his mercy, in rewarding his faithful followers. (Note, 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) Nor was this "crown of righteousness" laid up "for him only," or for other eminent ministers or martyrs; but for all believers in every age and place, even for all "who love Christ's appearing." For they all expect, prepare, and wait for his second coming, they look for their gracious recompense from him at that period; they "endure hardships," and deny themselves the pleasures of the world, and give up its interests in hopes o that recompense; they regulate their habitual conduct, as those who believe 'that he will come to be their Judge; they long to see him as he is, to be freed by him from all sin, and to witness his triumph over all his enemies; and, as far as faith and hope exclude anxious doubts of their acceptance, they love the thoughts of his appearing to raise the dead and judge the world. (Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. 25:1—30. 1 Thes. 1:9,10. Tit. 2:13. Heb. 9:27,28. Jam. 5:9—11. 2 Pet. 3:10—13.)—Crown of righteousness. (8) Notes, Jam. 1:12. 1 Pet. 5:1—4. Rev. 2:10,11. 4:4,5,9—11.

V. 9—13. The apostle greatly desired Timothy to come to him, as he was almost solitary in his imprisonment, and had scarcely any with him, whom he could employ in needful services. Demas, of whom he seems before to have judged very favourably, had forsaken him in his perilous situation, "having loved this present world." He had not courage to venture his life, by continuing with the apostle under his persecutions: he loved the world too much to give up all for Christ; and perhaps some prospect of secular advantage offered itself, with which he was caught, and he departed to Thessalonica in pursuit of it. Whether he finally apostatized or not, we cannot certainly tell: but the apostle "stood in doubt of him." (Preface.—Col. 4:14. Notes, 1 John 2:15—17.) —Two other helpers, known to Timothy, were gone to different places, about the work of the Lord with the apostle's approbation; so that "only Luke," his faithful companion in all his sufferings, continued with him. He therefore desired Timothy to bring Mark with him, who was employed in the same parts. Mark had once forsaken the apostle, having too much "loved this present world;" but he had repented, and had now regained his entire confidence, and might be "profitable to him for the ministry" at Rome, as he had been in other places. (Note, Col. 4:9—14. P. O. 7—18.) He also informed Timothy, that "he had sent Tychichus to Ephesus." This has been deemed a decisive proof, that Timothy was not at Ephesus at that time, and indeed it greatly favours that conclusion: but possibly, Tychicus might be sent by another way than the bearer of this epistle, and calling at other places might not arrive till afterwards; and the apostle might mean, that he had sent Tychicus to supply Timothy's place at Ephesus, that he might come to him the sooner.—Among these informations and directions, we find St. Paul desiring Timothy to bring his cloak to him. If the word means a cloak, or upper garment, (as it seems to do,) which he supposed he might want at the approach of winter, this a remarkable proof of his poverty to the end of his life, that we should need to send so far for a garment to keep him warm during the remnant of his days! (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:9—13. 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 11:24—27.)—What books and parchments were meant, Timothy would know; but it is in vain for us to conjecture. As Troas was not in the direct road from Ephesus to Rome, this may be urged as a proof that Timothy was not then at Ephesus: but it is not certain, that he might not go by another way, to call upon some of the churches with which he was connected.—These directions favour the opinion, that the apostle had been hurried away, by his persecutors, from these eastern regions; without being allowed leisure, either to accomplish his plans, or to take with him those things which he intended.

V. 14, 15. It is not certain, though highly probable, that this was the same Alexander, of whom we have before read. (Acts 19:33. 1 Tim. 1:20.) The apostle, however, was assured that the person spoken of was an incurable apostate, or enemy to Christ. Perhaps, after having been excommunicated, he had openly renounced Christianity, and did every thing he could to stir up persecution against St. Paul and the believers, and to obstruct the success of the gospel: and it is not improbable, that he took an active part in the apostle's being apprehended by his persecutors, and hurried away to Rome. Speaking, however, by the Spirit of prophecy, he denounced this awful sentence on him for a warning to others. We cannot certainly know, who are given up to final obduracy; and must therfore persevere in praying for our enemies and persecutors. (Notes, Matt. 12:31,32. Heb. 6:4—6. 10: 26—31. 1 John 5:16—18.)—It is worthy of special notice, that all those passages in the book of Psalms, which, as containing predictions or imprecations on the enemies of David, or rather of Christ the Antitype, are considered even by many pious persons inconsistent with the Christian dispensation, are exactly for substance, the same as the language of the apostle in this place; that is, of one speaking by the Spirit of prophecy. Did the Spirit of God, who spake by David, (Note, 2 Sam. 23:3,4.) dictate to him a vindictive language, contrary to that which he dictated to the apostles of Christ? Is not this supposition highly dishonourable both to the word of God, and to the Spirit which inspired it? (Notes, Deut. 27:15. Ps. 69:22—28. 109:6—20.)—Timothy was moreover warned to beware of the malignant and subtle machinations of this wicked man; as he would do as much to injure him, and withstand his words, as he had done in opposing the apostle and his doctrine.

Reward. (14) Αποδωη.

V. 16—18. When the apostle was at first, during his second imprisonment, called before the emperor, (or the prefect of the city in his absence, as it is more generally thought,) to make his defence, none of the Christians at Rome had courage to stand by him; but all forsook him to provide for their own safety, even as the apostles had forsaken Christ, when he was apprehended. (Notes, Matt. 26:25—35,47—56. John 16:31—33. 18:4—9.) The cruel persecutions of the Christians at Rome, under Nero, seem to have preceded the writing of this epistle. Numbers had then been put to death, in the most dreadful manner, or driven from the city; and the rest seem to have been greatly intimidated: so that on this important occasion none were found who ventured to attend the apostle to the tribunal. This was a very criminal weakness, the effect of unbelief; but the apostle prayed that it "might not be laid to their charge." (Notes, 14,15. Luke 22: 21—23,31—34.)—But, though deserted by man, the Lord was graciously pleased to "stand with him," and make him sensible of his presence, favour, and protection: thus giving him strength of faith, courageously to bear witness to the truth before his persecutors; (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) that so "the preaching," even the gospel of Christ, might be fully known, by those in authority, and by all present; and that it might, by means of these events, be circulated among the Gentiles in distant nations with the most overbearing evidence of its divine authority. (Note, 1—5.) Indeed, though his judge was powerful and outrageous; he had been, for that time, "delivered" from him, as out of a lion's mouth. (Notes, Dan. 6:18—23. Heb. 11:32—34.) Perhaps the apostle had in view that "adversary, who goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour;" and who was not entirely without hope, that the fear of death would induce Paul to renounce the faith; and that he should thus seize upon his soul. (Note, 1 Pet. 5:8,9.) The apostle did not expect to escape martyrdom: but he was confident that "the Lord would deliver him from every evil work," not suffering Satan to prevail against him, to induce him to do any thing inconsistent with the honour of the gospel, or the benefit of his soul; and "that he would preserve him to his heavenly kingdom." (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Gen. 48:16. Matt. 6:13.) Instead therefore of complaints or despondency, he was ready to ascribe "glory to the Lord for ever and ever;" or to "ages of ages," that is, to eternal ages. "Amen."

Answer. (16) Απολογια. See on Acts 22:1.—I pray God, that it may not be laid to their charge.] Μη αυτοις λογισθειη. "May it not be imputed to them." Rom. 4:3, &c. 24. 5:3. 24. 5:3. 2 Cor. 5:19. (Note, Acts 7:54—60.)

V. 19—22. Prisca, or Priscilla, and Aquila were near to the place where Timothy resided: but, as they frequently changed their abode, this does not determine where he then was. (Notes, Acts 18:1—6,18—23. Rom. 16:3,4.) The same remark may be made concerning the family of Onesiphorus. (Note, 1:16—18.) The apostle had probably been attended by Erastus and Trophimus, when he last parted with Timothy: but the former abode at Corinth, and the latter was left sick at Miletum; the Lord not seeing good to enable the apostle to work a miracle for his recovery. Having again desired Timothy to come to him before winter, (probably apprehending that he might otherwise come too late to see him,) he concluded with repeated prayers and benedictions.—Surely, every reader must be fully satisfied, from reading the close of this epistle, that St. Peter was not at Rome when it was written: if therefore, he suffered martyrdom, at the same time when the apostle Paul did, according to ancient tradition, he must have arrived at that city, after this epistle had been sent. Timothy accompanied the apostle from Corinth, through Macedonia, probably to Miletus, when he went to Jerusalem before his first imprisonment at Rome. (Acts 20:4—16.) It would therefore have been wholly superfluous to inform him concerning Erastus, if that voyage had been spoken of: and Trophimus accompanied the apostle to Jerusalem. (Acts 21:29.)—Some, indeed, suppose Miletum in Crete, mentioned by Homer, to be intended; but, in that case, St. Paul must have left Trophimus there, at some time subsequent to the voyage towards Rome, in which he suffered shipwreck; for no intimation of such an event is given in that narrative.—Martial, a Roman poet, who lived about this time, mentions Pudens and Claudia: and some suppose, that the same persons are here meant, and that they were converted to Christianity, by the apostle, during his imprisonment.—The Lord Jesus be with thy spirit. (22) What would a well-informed protestant think of a similar prayer, in which the name of any saint, any mere man, or created being was inserted, instead of "the Lord Jesus?" Would it not be considered as an act of idolatry, and that justly? And would not papists bring it as a voucher for their worship of saints, with much plausibility?—But Jesus is "Emmanuel, God with us." (Notes, Matt. 1:22,23. 28:19,20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The importance of the work of ministers, the peculiar temptations to which they are exposed, and the multiplied evil effects of their unfaithfulness or negligence, concur in rendering it needful, most solemnly and repeatedly, to charge the most zealous of them, as "in the presence of God and of the Lord Jesus," before whom they must shortly appear, to give an account of their stewardship; that "they preach the word, instant in season, out of season," to few or many, as opportunities offer; like men engaged in the work, who make it their one great business and pleasure; without consulting their own ease, interest, or reputation, or shrinking from hardship, reproach, or persecution; and that they "reprove, rebuke, exhort," with forbearance and perseverance, with plain instructions, and close application. This is the more indispensable, as the time is indeed now come, when even a large majority of professed Christians "will not endure sound doctrin :" they are offended by the humbling truths of the gospel, or ..y the heart-searching, distinguishing, practical truths of Scripture, which detect their sins, and show the necessity of mortifying their peculiar lusts: and they desire to be soothed and flattered in the indulgence of them, and to have "teachers according to them." Hence some admire complaisant, ingenious, or eloquent harangues: others prefer curious, speculative disquisitions; or virulent invectives, on men of diverse sects and sentiments. Thus their consciences are quieted, and their self-preference and contempt of others, are humoured, together with a curious and captious temper. And because "they have itching ears," the pruriency of which is not easily quieted, "they heap to themselves teachers," and always require new voices, new gifts, new notions; till their ears are wholly "turned from the truth, and they are turned unto fables." This should induce those who love souls, "to watch in all things," to venture and endure all painful effects of faithfulness, to take every opportunity of preaching the pure gospel; and to "make full proof of their ministry," that they may do all the good in it which they possibly can. In doing this, they should be quickened by the consideration, that their brethren, one after another, are taken away, or laid aside; and that their own term of usefulness will soon expire. In this "manner of life," however, we may hope to "be ready" for the stroke of death, when the time of our departure arrives: for the diligent Christian, or faithful minister, who is conscious of having acted in good measure consistently with his profession, may with comfort say, at the close of his days, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me at that day, and to all who love his appearing." The true believer will give all the praise to divine grace, and expect acceptance only by faith in Christ: but his conduct will prove, that "he hath loved the Lord, who first loved him," and that he has exercised the faith of God's elect. (Notes, Rom. 8: 28—31. 1 John 4:19.) Such a man may, therefore, amidst poverty, contempt, pain, sickness, and the agonies of death, "rejoice in hope of the glory of God." But this triumphant language cannot properly be adopted, when most needed by those who have been negligent, lukewarm, and unfaithful in the service of God, from the time of their supposed conversion. In proportion as the duties of a man's place and station are neglected, his evidence of an interest in Christ must be obscured; and uncertainty and discouragement may probably distress his closing scene. (Note, Heb. 4:1,2. P. O. 1—11.)

V. 9—22. There are various characters in the visible church, and various changes take place among ministers Some, who have apparently "run well, are hindered," and forsake the Lord and his faithful servants, "loving this present world:" others are recovered from grievous backslidings, and become "profitable for the ministry:" and not a few turn open apostates or virulent opposers, "doing much harm" to the servants of Christ, and greatly withstanding their words; whom "the Lord will reward according to their works." Others bring their characters into doubt, or incur disgrace, by their cowardice in times of danger; and their brethren are called on to pray for them, that "the Lord would not lay that sin to their charge." But a few proceed with diligence and courage in every circumstance: though "no man stands with them, the Lord is with them" to strengthen and comfort them; he "gives them a mouth and wisdom, which all their enemies cannot gainsay;" (Note, Luke 21:12—19, v. 15.) he delivers them from outward dangers and enemies, as long as it is good for them; he "preserves them from the mouth of the lion," which would destroy their souls; and he "keeps them from every evil work even unto his heavenly kingdom." Unnumbered multitudes are now before the throne, giving glory to his name: may we be followers of them; may "the Lord Jesus be with our spirits," to comfort and sanctify them; and may his grace be with all his disciples and ministers in every place! Amen.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TITUS.

It is remarkable, that Titus, of whom the apostle repeatedly speaks in terms of the highest approbation and most cordial affection in his epistles, is not once mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. (Notes, 2 Cor. 2:1,2,13. 7:5—7. 8:16—24. 12:17—21. Gal. 2:1—5.) Nor is any thing recorded, concerning St. Paul's labours in Crete, now called Candia, a large island in the Mediterranean Sea. It is indeed probable, that the gospel was made known there at an early period; as there were Cretes present on the day of Pentecost, to witness the stupendous miracles of that glorious season; and to hear the unanswerable sermon of St. Peter, on that wonderful occasion. (Acts 2:11.) If, however, any, who were then converted, on their return home, made known the gospel to their neighbours; the joyful report from them would reach none but the Jews and proselytes. But no information is given us of what passed in that island, at that time, or afterwards; except as this epistle shows, that St. Paul had labored there. Probably, this was subsequent to his first imprisonment at Rome, and before his second. He seems to have had very great success in his ministry, in that island; but, by some means, to have been hurried thence, before he could order the state of the churches, in a regular manner. (Note, 2 Tim. 4:9—13.) He, therefore, left Titus there, to settle the churches in the several cities of the island, according to the apostolical plan in other places.—Tradition, and ecclesiastical records, have made Titus bishop of Crete: and, because so large an island, renowned for a hundred cities, was an extensive charge; some have conferred on him the title of archbishop. But I am by no means convinced, that even this title would not have been a derogation from his real dignity as an evangelist.—'If by saying Timothy and Titus were bishops, the one of Ephesus, the other of Crete, we understand that they took upon them these churches, or dioceses, as their fixed and particular charge, in which they were to preside for the term of life; I believe that Timothy and Titus were not thus bishops: For both Timothy and Titus were evangelists.—Now the work of an evangelist, says Eusebius, was this, to lay the foundation of churches in barbarous nations, to constitute them pastors; and having committed to them the cultivating of those new plantations, they passed on to other countries.—As to Titus, he was only left in Crete, "to ordain elders in every city, and to set in order the things that were wanting." Having therefore done that work, he had done all that was assigned him in that station, and therefore St. Paul sends for him the very next year to Nicopolis.' Whitby. It is, however, recorded, that he afterwards returned to Crete, and died there, when ninety-four years of age.—Dr. Whitby never doubted, nor does the author of these notes at all doubt, that diocesan episcopacy was generally introduced into the churches, even during the lives of some of the apostles. But the office of an evangelist of old, and that of a true missionary at present, should be considered as perfectly distinct from that of a bishop; and, in some respects, (especially as a general commission, to preach the gospel to the nations,) superior to it.—The postscript states that the epistle was written from Nicopolis in Macedonia: but, had this been the case, the apostle would have said, "I have determined here to winter," not "there to winter." (3:12.) There were several cities called Nicopolis; and it is not certain which is here meant The scope and instructions of this epistle are similar to those of the two preceding.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle shows the nature and importance of his office, and salutes Titus, 1—4. He states for what purpose Titus had been left in Crete, 5; and what manner of persons should be ordained to the ministry, 6—9. He exposes the dangerous principles and the selfishness of the false teachers, "whose mouths must be stopped," 10, 11: and the bad national character of the Cretians; whom Titus must "sharply rebuke" and instruct, that "they may be sound in the faith," 12—16.

to the faith of God's elect;" (Notes, John 10:14—18,26—31. Acts 13:42—48. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) and was intended to bring numbers to believe in Christ; and to encourage, increase, and direct the faith of those who already believed. (Note, 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) This he performed, by professing and publicly declaring the "truth which is after godliness." Thus men would understand, receive, and profess those truths, which, being truly believed, bring those who have been alienated from God, to reverence, trust, love, and worship him, as his obedient children and devoted servants. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) This truth he preached, and his converts acknowledged, amidst manifold trials, "in hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie," (that is, break his word, or deceive those who trust in him,) "had promised before eternal times;" namely, to Christ, as their Surety. (Note, 2 Tim. 1:9.) This purpose, or promise, had been concealed, or but in part revealed, in former ages: but in due time God "had manifested" it, as "his word, through preaching," or by the preaching of the gospel, which had been committed to the apostle, "according to the commandment," or appointment, "of God our Saviour." (Note, 2 Tim. 1:10.) He therefore wrote to Titus, "his genuine son, in that faith," which was common to all true Christians; as he had been converted by his ministry, and trained up under him, for the work of an evangelist: (Marg. Ref. o, p.) and in his behalf he presented his usual devout desires and prayers for "grace, mercy, and peace." (Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Tim. 1:1,2. 2 Tim. 1:2.)—The expression, "God our Saviour," seems here to relate to the Godhead without distinction of persons; and in some places it refers to the person of the Father, as saving us by his beloved Son. (Notes, 3:4—7. 1 Tim. 1:1,2.)—Some explain the words rendered, "before the world began," to relate to the promise made to Adam, or to Abraham, before the promulgation of the Mosaic law. But I must think, that the interpretation above given is far more obvious. If indeed Christ be "the Chosen of God," the Surety and Representative of "all who were given to him:" (Notes, John 6:36—40. 17:1—3.) eternal life was promised to him, in behalf of his people, of all who in every age should believe in him, "before the world was;" in consequence of his engagement to become incarnate, and to be obedient even to the death upon the cross. "Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world." Allow this, (and who will venture to deny it?) and then the promise of eternal life to the divine Logos, in behalf of all his people, is clear, and the meaning satisfactory; which, in my judgment at least, the other interpretations by no means are.

Cannot lie. (2) Ἀψευδὴς. Surely this was not from want of liberty or power, but through the moral inability of perfect holiness. V. 5—9. Titus had been left in Crete, "to set in order," or regulate, "the things which were wanting," in the government, worship, and discipline of the churches; and especially "to ordain elders in every city," in which there were converts to Christianity. (Notes, Acts 14:21—23. 1 Tim. 5:21,22, 24,25. 2 Tim. 2:1,2.) There were many cities in this populous island, and the apostle must have been very successful during his stay there: but probably many had before been converted to Christianity; and there is no ground to conclude that churches were planted in all, or even the greatest part of these cities. The character and qualifications of those eligible to be pastors, (who are called elders and bishops indiscriminately; Notes, Acts 20:17. Phil. 1:1.) correspond to what has before been considered: but it is here added, that they ought to be such, as "had believing children." They must not be admitted to the pastoral office, who had children grown up; if these did not embrace Christianity, or were accused of riot and licentiousness, or would not be governed, and restrained from scandalous vices. The pastors must be chosen from those, who had for some time professed the gospel, when that could be done: but if their children proved untractable, it would at least be thought, that they did not know how to govern their own families; and the misconduct of the children might reflect disgrace upon the Christian religion, as well as weaken the hands of their parents in the public ministry. (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:1—7.) For the overseer and steward of God's household (Note, 1 Cor. 4:1,2.) must be an irreproachable person; and not of an overbearing, self-willed, dogmatical temper, who could not endure to be opposed or contradicted. To the other excellencies of his character, it was needful that he should be a man, who "held fast" in a steady, consistent profession, "the faithful word" of the gospel, according as it had been taught by the apostles; without having perverted or sophisticated it, as many did. (Notes, Job 2:1—3. 23:8—12. Prov. 23:23. 2 Tim. 1:13,14. Rev. 2:12,13,24—28. 3:10,11.) Thus he would be a judicious, experienced, able defender of its truths; competent, by substantial, salutary, and holy doctrine, in every particular, to exhort the disciples to steadfastness in the faith, and to an honourable conduct; and to confute, convince, or silence gainsayers, who opposed or corrupted the truth.

V. 10—13. The qualification last mentioned was the more requisite, as there were in every place, (especially in Crete,) a number of ungovernable "talkers," and interested "deceivers," who could not be kept by any censures or admonitions, from doing great mischief. These were of various descriptions; but the Judaizing teachers were the most busy, unruly, and pernicious; they "subverted whole families," turning them aside from the simplicity of faith in Christ, to attend on legal ceremonies and human traditions; by "teaching such things as they ought not," and this "for filthy lucre's sake," rather than from mistake or ignorance. (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) For in this manner they humoured the pride and prejudices of some, and flattered others in their sins; till they got to be the heads of a party, and found means of enriching themselves. The "mouths," therefore, of these deceivers "must be stopped," by sound doctrine, and conclusive arguments, and testimonies from the word of God; that the tendency of their principles, and the baseness of their designs, might be manifest to every man; and that they might have nothing to say in their own defence. (Marg. Ref.)—The character of the Cretians indeed was so bad, that numbers, both of deceivers and deceived, might be expected in their churches: for Epimenides, a native of Crete, a poet of some reputation, who might be called "a prophet of their own," and who perhaps was deemed a prophet by his countrymen, had said, "The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies;" they had in all ages been notorious for lies, frauds, and impostures; they were like poisonous or ferocious animals, gluttonous and indolent to excess; so that, while a great proportion of their time was employed in eating and drinking, they were rendered torpid and inactive by their excesses, and made no good use of the rest. They united the subtlety of the fox, the venom of the serpent, or the fierceness of wolves and tigers, with the greediness and inactivity of swine.—It is not easy to determine, from what concurrence of circumstances the Cretians obtained so odious and con

CHAPTER II.

The apostle directs Titus to instruct the people in their several relative duties, for the honour of the gospel; to exemplify them in his own conduct, and to take heed to his doctrine, 1—8; to teach servants to be obedient and upright, that "in all things they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour," 9, 10. He enforces his exhortations, by showing the holy tendency and efficacy of the gospel, and charges Titus to act with authority and firmness, 11—15.

BUT speak thou the things [a]which become sound doctrine:

temptible a national character: but the inspired apostle attested the truth of this testimony; and the effects of it appeared in the conduct of many false teachers and professors of Christianity. Titus was therefore directed "to rebuke them sharply," or with cutting reproofs and awful warnings; "that the churches might be sound in the faith," when the mouths of deceivers were thus stopped, hypocrites detected, and unestablished Christians put upon their guard.—Timothy had been taught to instruct opposers with meekness, and to rebuke with long suffering; (Notes, 1 Tim. 5:1,2. 2 Tim. 2:23—26.) but Titus was ordered to rebuke with sharpness. Some have conjectured, that Timothy was too vehement in his natural spirit, and Titus too timid and pliant: others ascribe the difference to the opposite characters of the persons to be rebuked. But, in fact, Christian meekness is as distant from pusillanimous connivance at sin and error, as from impetuous anger and impatience. This the apostle's conduct, and even that of our Lord himself, fully demonstrate. (Notes, Jam. 3:17,18.)

V. 14—16. In order to the churches in Crete being "sound in the faith," Titus was directed to warn them not to "give heed to Jewish fables," human traditions, or even legal observances, which were then entirely "the commandments of men," who turned "from the truth," and wanted to impose their own observances on Christians. (Notes, Col. 2:20—23. 1 Tim. 1:3,7. 4:6—10. 6:1—5. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 4:1—5.) These related greatly to distinctions of clean and unclean meats, and the pharisaical inventions of washing the hands, and other frivolous rites of that kind. (Notes, Matt. 15:1—20.) But "to the pure," to the real believer, who had "peace with God through Jesus Christ," and had "his heart purified by faith," all such things were pure in themselves, and used in a holy manner, by the allowance, according to the precepts, and for the glory of God. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) To those, however, "that were defiled" with the guilt and pollution of unrepented sin; and who, through unbelief, remained strangers to the "purging of the conscience with the blood of Christ," "nothing was pure:" for as their hearts were unsanctified, and their consciences erroneous, partial, callous, and unclean: so all their enjoyments and actions, however innocent or good in themselves, were corrupted by pride, avarice, sensuality, and enmity against God. (Note, Prov. 21:4.) Many of these indeed "professed to know God," and to be his people; but in works they denied him, and manifested a disregard to his authority, favour, and indignation; for their conduct in all respects, especially in crucifying Christ, persecuting Christians, and endeavouring to subvert the churches of the Gentiles, proved them to be "abominable and disobedient;" and, as "to every good work, rejected" by God, and given up to judicial blindness.—The unbelieving Jews seem to have been primarily intended; but the Judaizing teachers were purposely included as unbelievers also, though they professed to believe.

Turn from the truth. (14) Αποστρεφομενων την αληθειαν. 2 Tim. 1:15. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. All, who are not the slaves of sin and Satan are "the servants of God:" "this honour have all his saints," and this dignifies their meanest employments; (Notes, Is. 54:15—17. John 12:23—26. Rom. 6:16—19. Col. 3:22—25.) though the office of ministers is confined to a few, and that of apostles and evangelists to a very small number. But sinners cannot "serve God," except "according to the faith of his elect" people; and by "acknowledging the truth which is after godliness:" (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:16. 4:6—10.) nor can they be steadfast, in the midst of trials and temptations, except "in hope of eternal life." (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:55—58. Heb. 6:14—20.) This was promised in Christ, "before the world began:" and though he who gave this promise can do all things, yet he "cannot lie," he cannot "deny himself." In his own times he has manifested his "word of truth, by preaching:" and all who are called to this important service, must take heed to publish it "according to the commandment of God our Saviour," that "the common faith" may thus be conferred on numbers, whom they may rejoice in as their "own children;" and to whom "grace, mercy, and peace, may be given from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour."—When a multitude of captives are brought forth from the dark dungeon of Satan, into the glorious light and liberty of the gospel; many things will be wanting, and much will require to "be set in order," before their worship and service can be performed in a suitable manner, the best methods used for their edification, and the most effectual defence made against the assaults of their spiritual enemies. Then the presence, counsel, and influence of experienced and faithful servants of God, will be peculiarly useful; especially in respect of the choice and ordination of pastors, to preside over them and teach them. Those to whom this important trust is committed, are bound, as they shall answer for it before God, to appoint "blameless and faithful men" to this stewardship; even such as are of pliant tempers, in respect of their own humours and interests, but firm in the cause of God; peaceable, sober, temperate men; superior to the grovelling love of "filthy lucre;" "lovers of hospitality and of good men;" just and holy; prudent managers of domestic concerns; attentive to relative duties; constant and bold, in professing the truth as taught in the word of God; and "able by sound doctrine to exhort and to convince gainsayers."—It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers to educate their children with diligence and piety, and to rule them with prudence and firmness: and the children of ministers should consider what a dreadful account must be rendered by them, if their unbelief, riot, and unruly behaviour bring an imputation on the character of their fathers, interfere with their usefulness, and thus occasion the ruin of immortal souls.

V. 10—16. In all ages, there have been "unruly and vain talkers and deceivers," by whom Satan sows tares in the Lord's field: and this should teach and induce the servants of God, to be vigilant and diligent, that they may counteract the enemy. For unless the "mouths of such men be stopped," they will "subvert whole families" of hopeful persons, and teach the most pernicious doctrines "for filthy lucre's sake." To prevent this mischief is the most difficult part of a minister's work: and his wisdom must especially be shown, in discerning men's characters; distinguishing between the weak and the wicked: and knowing when to exhort with gentleness, and when to "rebuke with sharpness, that men may be sound in the faith." For though there are national differences of character, yet "the heart" of man, in every time and place, is "deceitful and desperately wicked;" and some need the gentlest guidance, others must be exposed, and warned with decided severity; or they will "turn men away from the faith to fables" and human inventions, yea diabolical delusions.—The true Christian learns to exercise his liberty in a pure and holy manner; all thing are "pure to him," and grace teaches him "to eat, and to drink, and to do all to the glory of God;" and when he fails, he has humble recourse to the purifying blood and sanctifying grace of Christ. But unbelievers are "defiled in their minds and consciences;" their ordinary actions and religious duties are unclean to them: whether they riot in licentiousness, as if that were liberty; or whether they enslave themselves to superstitious observances. For alas! numbers, of various descriptions, "profess to know God, but in works deny him; being abominable, disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate." But at last "the tree will be known by its fruit; and every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit shall be hewn down and cast into the fire."

NOTES.—Chap. II. V. 1, 2. To mark the difference between false teachers, and the servants of Christ, the apostle exhorted Titus to "speak such things as became sound doctrine;" or the salutary, healing truths of the gospel, from which all the motives and encouragements to holy obedience must be deduced: and it "became sound doctrine," that preachers should inculcate on their hearers the practice of their various duties, from evangelical motives. Thus they ought to teach "the aged man to be sober," serious, prudent, vigilant, "grave, temperate," in every kind of indulgence, and "sound in faith," steadfast in the profession of faith in Christ; "in charity," or love to him and their brethren, and "in patience and perseverance," amidst trials and persecutions. It does not appear, that the elders or pastors of the church were exclusively intended. The original word is different from that translated elders, and signifies men advanced in years. The apostle had before spoken of the elders. (Note, 1:5—9.)

V. 3—6. Aged women also (whether employed as deaconesses by the church or not) should be instructed to act consistently with their sacred character, as professedly a part of the spiritual priesthood, and with that devotedness to God which it implied. (Note, 1 Tim. 2:8—10.) They should be warned against speaking slanders, or calumnies; a sin to which human nature is peculiarly prone, and to which the natural character of the Cretians must give them an additional propensity. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:8—13.) They must not be "enslaved to much wine:" some of them might have been accustomed to this, when heathens; and it would need great self-denial to acquire victory over the habit, and liberty from the thraldom, of this infatuating vice. They were likewise required to be "teachers of good things," in their families, and to their juniors: that so they might be employed in exhorting "the younger women to be sober" and prudent, without levity or vanity; affectionate to their husbands and children, and taking pleasure in the duties of wives and mothers; discreetly avoiding "all appearance of evil," or ground of suspicion, as well as every actual violation of conjugal fidelity. They must also teach them to be "keepers at home," and diligent in managing their domestic affairs; not delighting to gad abroad, nor yet loitering away their time at home; to be good or kind to all around them; "and obedient to their own husbands," even if they were not Christians, and if they in many things behaved improperly to them: for this would frequently be the case. (Notes, Eph. 5:22—33. 1 Pet. 3:1—6.) These things must be attended to, "that the word of God might not be blasphemed," or evil spoken of, among the Gentiles, through any improper conduct of Christians in relative life. (Notes, 7,8. Rom. 2:17—24. 1 Tim. 5:13—15. 6:1—5. 1 Pet. 2:13—17. 3:13—16.)—Young men also must "be sober-minded," and act in a prudent and considerate manner: avoiding all youthful lusts and vanities, and attending to their several duties in the fear of God. V. 7, 8. It was especially incumbent on Titus to give, in his own conduct, a pattern of all those "good works" to which he exhorted others, that they might have his example for a comment on his instructions. (Notes, 2 Thes. 3:6—9. 1 Tim. 4:11—16. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) In his doctrine or public instruction also, he should take care to preserve "uncorruptness," not admitting any of those additions, by which the holy nature and efficacy of divine truth might be altered; "gravity," avoiding every thing ludicrous, all affectation of wit, or whatever did not consist with the solemnity becoming the great concerns of God and eternity; and "sincerity," or an upright, evident, and single aim to the glory of God and the good of souls; without seeking applause or worldly advantage, or appearing to have any selfish designs in what he did. He must also use "sound speech, that could not be condemned" as erroneous, ambiguous, unintelligible, or of bad tendency: that, divine truth being thus stated, in plain, convincing, and scriptural language, "those who were of a contrary part," whether heathens or heretics, might find nothing weak, frivolous, or unguarded, to object against; but that such as attempted to find fault with what was so evidently good and beneficial, might be put to shame, "having no evil thing to say of him."

V. 9, 10. (Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Col. 3:22—25. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) In general, servants must be exhorted to be "obedient to their own masters," and to make it their constant endeavour to please them well, and give them full satisfaction, in every part of their conduct: and, in particular, they must not "answer again," with rudeness or warmth, when found fault with, even though they had not been to blame; but rather bear an unmerited rebuke, than engage in altercations and give further offence, or incur the charge of impertinence. They ought also scrupulously to avoid "purloining," or pilfering, in the absence of their masters, such things as were put under their care, or within their reach; either to apply them to their own use, or to bestow them on their companions. This species of stealing was so common among the heathen servants, that the same word sometimes signifies a slave, which is generally rendered a thief: and it is to be apprehended that it is extremely common, even among servants who are called Christians; few of whom are scrupulous about using or disposing of the provisions of the family, contrary to the intentions and interests of their masters: nay, frequently they affect the praise and pride of generosity, by giving away the property of their masters to dishonest hangers on, who acknowledge the obligation by reciprocal favours. But Christian servants must be taught strict honesty in these things, and "to show all good fidelity," by uprightly using or saving whatever was intrusted to them, according to the will of their masters; being satisfied with the provision allotted them, and not countenancing any degree of waste or embezzlement. Thus they must "adorn the doctrine of God or Saviour in all things:" for though the doctrine of salvation from the abundant mercy of God the Father, through the person and righteousness, atonement and mediation of Emmanuel, and by faith in him, and by the regeneration and sanctification of the Holy Spirit, by faith in the divine Saviour, had unspeakable glory and beauty in it, in the view of all the redeemed, and of the holy angels; (Notes, Eph. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 5:8—14.) yet unconverted men could not discern this, but rather deemed it foolish, absurd, and pernicious: and the misconduct of professed Christians would confirm them in this ruinous prejudice. On the other hand, honesty, fidelity, industry, a peaceable, obliging conduct, and exact conscientiousness, in servants professing the gospel, would put an ornament and a lustre on the doctrine, in the view of unbelievers. This would, when the apostle wrote, peculiarly attract the notice even of heathen masters; such an argument of its excellency would be intelligible to them; it would appeal to their hearts and consciences; and they would thus be rendered more favourable to the truth, and might be induced at length to hear and embrace it. The same observation may be equally applied to every other instance of relative and social good behaviour.

V. 11, 12. The nature of Christianity required, that such exhortations as have been considered should be given and observed: for "the grace of God which bringeth salvation," or the saving grace of God, and his abundant love to lost sinners, 12 [n]Teaching us, that [o]denying ungodliness, and worldly lusts, we should [p]live [q]soberly, righteously, and [r]godly, in [s]this present world;

as discovered in the gospel of Christ, "had appeared to all men," or had been illustriously displayed before Jews and Gentiles, of every rank and character, without exception; and the preachers were directed to preach to all, and invite all, to whom they could obtain access. This doctrine, in the most energetic manner, taught all who heard it, "to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts;" as it exhibited, in the clearest light, the holiness and justice of God, the obligations and requirements of his perfect law, the evil of sin, the future state of retributions, the lost condition of fallen man, his need of mercy and grace, and the encouragements given him to "repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance." It taught men, that they ought to deny ungodliness; showed them how they might be enabled to do it, and supplied the most powerful motives to set about it. Moreover, when this "saving grace" of God took possession of the heart in regeneration; the new nature, under the influences of the Holy Spirit, inwardly and efficaciously taught men the same things; "the law was written in their minds;" while new and more constraining motives to obedience were drawn from the obligations of redeeming love, the comforts of communion with God, and the hope of heavenly felicity.—Thus in every age, the gospel teaches men outwardly in general, and grace inwardly teaches believers in particular, "to deny ungodliness," to refuse compliance with every suggestion from whatever quarter, to neglect God and their duty to him, or to treat him with irreverence, ingratitude, contempt, and enmity; and constantly to resist and counteract that principle of alienation from God, whence all idolatry, infidelity, impiety, and irreligion, in thought, word and deed, originate. It teaches them also to "deny worldly lusts," refusing to gratify those impetuous, carnal, and selfish desires of the human heart, which influence men to seek happiness from the world, and not from God; such as pride, ambition, avarice, sensuality, wrath, malice, and envy; whence spring all kinds of contentions, wars, cruelties, injustice, frauds, oppressions, murders, intemperance, and licentiousness, which disturb, desolate, and plague the earth. These "the saving grace of God" teaches us constantly and resolutely to deny, resist, and mortify; refusing them every kind of indulgence, opposing their first risings in the heart, and avoiding all temptations to them. (Notes, Rom. 6:1,2. Gal. 2:17—21. 5:19—26. 6:11—14. 1 Pet. 4:1—5.)—The holy law of God, indeed, teaches men to love God and each other: but, requiring perfect obedience, it gives sinners neither injunction nor encouragement to repentance, and to "works meet for repentance," or to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts. It shuts them up under sin, and leaves them in that state, without hope or help: for every command, counsel, and encouragement to a sinner, properly belongs not to the law, but to "the saving grace of God," according to the gospel. (Note, Gal. 3:6—14,19—22.)—This grace inwardly and efficaciously teaches all who receive it, as the necessary effect of "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts," "to live soberly," in the conscientious government of every appetite and passion; refraining from every unlawful and inexpedient indulgence, and from whatever can be injurious to themselves or others, in body or soul, or in respect of social and relative comfort. It teaches them also "to live righteously," according to the requirements of universal justice, to all ranks and orders of men; in all commercial transactions and relative duties, to superiors, equals, and inferiors; in a conscientious, faithful, and upright submission and service to rulers and masters, parents, and husbands; in an equitable and humane treatment of servants, labourers, and poor dependants; in a meek and forgiving conduct towards enemies; in exact truth, sincerity, and fidelity, respecting their conversation, professions, promises, and engagements; in a compassionate, kind, and liberal behaviour to the poor, afflicted, and distressed; and in a constant endeavour to promote the peace, comfort, and happiness, temporal and eternal, of all men, according to their ability and opportunity. In like manner, it teaches all who partake of it, to live "godly," or piously, attending on all the ordinances of God with reverent devotion, as means of grace, and as rendering him the tribute of adoration, praise, and gratitude due to his name; worshipping him in secret, in the family, and in public; hallowing his day, reverencing and studying his word, honouring his name, fearing, believing, loving, submitting to, obeying, and delighting in God, according to the requirements of his holy law; and expressing these affections of the soul, in a constant desire and aim to please and glorify him. The grace of God taught and still teaches men to live after this manner, "in this present world," notwithstanding all its snares, temptations, and corrupt examples, and the ill usage to be expected by those, "who will live godly in Christ Jesus;" and notwithstanding the remaining power of sin in the heart, with all the manifold infirmities and hinderances, of which the believer is conscious

V. 13. In this tenor of conduct, the gospel teaches believers to persevere; "looking for that blessed hope," or object of hope, which the promises of the gospel lead them to expect, at the end of their course of obedient faith: and waiting, in patient preparation, for "the appearing of the glory of the great God, even of our Saviour Jesus Christ," to judge the world, and perfect the salvation of his people. The invisible God, the divine Essence, "which no man hath seen or can see," will not be manifested at that solemn period; (Notes, John 1:18. 1 Tim. 6:13—16.) but Christ will be displayed, "in his own glory," as Mediator, "and in the glory of the Father:" and thus will appear "the glory of the great God, even of our Saviour Jesus Christ;" when, through his human nature, he shall exercise omnipotence, omniscience, and all the perfections of the Godhead, in assigning, by a single word, the everlasting state of unnumbered millions; while none shall be able to withstand the power, or object to the justice, of that awful decision. (Notes, Is. 45:23—25. Matt. 16:24—28. 25:31—33. Rom. 14:10—12. Rev. 20:11—15.)

V. 14. "The appearing of the glory," above mentioned, will be that of him, "who gave himself for us," to die in human nature, as a sacrifice, to atone for our sins and effect our salvation; that through his expiation, he might ransom us from the punishment due to all "our iniquity;" and by his power redeem and deliver us from the dominion and pollution of all sinful propensities; (Note, Ps. 130:7,8.) and that he might "purify us," by his word and Spirit, and by his concurring providential dispensations, from all remains of defilement, that we might be devoted to him, as our Lord and God, be his worshippers and servants, live to his glory, and so recommend his salvation; as "a peculiar people," his property, not only as creatures, but as redeemed sinners, and as having voluntarily devoted ourselves to him. (Notes, Matt. 1:20,21. 20: 24—28. John 10:14—18. Gal. 1:3—5. Eph. 5:1,2,22—27. 1 Pet. 3:17,18.) Thus all Christians are under "peculiar" obligations, as well as of a peculiar disposition; pious, spiritual, poor, humble, kind, and upright: not conforming to the customs and fashions of the world; but "zealous of good works," taking delight in obedience, waiting for and gladly embracing opportunities of doing good, as the ambitious do for opportunities of distinguishing themselves, or the covetous for occasions of increasing their possessions; and not regarding trouble, expense, or self-denial, in performing works of piety, righteousness, and charity, from zeal for the honour of Christ and love to mankind.—Surely these verses are calculated, in the most conclusive and affecting manner, to lead us to the confession of Christ by Thomas, "My Lord, and my God!"—The view of Christ, as Judge, in the preceding verse, and in this verse, as he, to whom all believers are devoted, "to live no longer to themselves but to him," as "a peculiar people zealous of good works," concur to establish this conclusion; for "Jehovah will not give his glory to another." V. 15. As the things above inculcated were a compendium of the important truths and duties of Christianity, Titus was directed to "speak" them decidedly; to exhort in the plainest and most urgent manner; and "to rebuke with all authority," in the name of Christ, those persons who neglected, perverted, or opposed them: that, acting with firmness, prudence, and faithfulness, no one might treat him or his words with contempt, without being evidently a despiser of Christ who sent him. CHAPTER III.

The apostle inculcates on Christians, subjection to rulers, and good behaviour to all men, 1, 2; from the consideration of their own sinfulness and their salvation by God's mercy through Christ, 3—8. He cautions Titus to avoid disputes; and shows him how to deal with heretics, 9—11: and, directing him to meet him at Nicopolis, and giving instructions about other matters, 12—14, he concludes with salutations, 15.

[a]PUT them in mind [b]to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, [c]to be ready to every good work,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. It "becomes sound doctrine," and it is indispensably incumbent on ministers, to teach all Christians their several relative duties, in connexion with evangelical principles.—"Aged men and women," "professing godliness," are peculiarly called on to "be sober, grave, temperate, stable, sound in faith, love, and patience:" and less allowance will be made for them, than for others, if they indulge in levity, vanity, and intemperance; or are betrayed into rashness, instability, or selfishness.—In proportion as Christians advance in years, they are supposed to understand better what behaviour, appearance, attire, and language "become holiness;" they will have no need to watch against censoriousness and peevishness; and they should be taught to seek comfort, under the decays of nature, from a nearer communion with God; and not from "much wine," which produces a most abject and disgraceful slavery, or from any inexpedient indulgence. (Note, Eph. 5:15—20.)—The excellence of true religion is manifested, when every one is taught and induced by it to attend on the duties of their several situations; and elderly persons are under strong obligations to be teachers of good things to their juniors, by word and deed. Thus aged and pious women may, with peculiar propriety, instruct young women in their duties, as wives and mothers, "teaching them to be sober, to love their husbands and children," and to show their love in a proper behaviour toward them; "to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home," diligent in their domestic employments, and "obedient to their own husbands;" and to persevere in this useful and honourable conduct, though they should meet with trials, hardships, or unkind usage; "that the word of God may not be blasphemed."—"Young men also must be exhorted to be sober-minded;" and to copy the seriousness, piety, purity, discretion, and temperance of those who are grown old in the service of Christ: and not the levity, excess, and folly of such as are preparing themselves anguish for riper years, or "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath." But those who would with energy inculcate these practical subjects, must "in all things show themselves patterns of good works;" or else the most scriptural admonitions will be disregarded, or expounded by their own conduct.—Uncorrupt doctrine, even "the word of the truth of the gospel," should be manifestly made the basis of practical exhortations; which ought to be delivered with gravity, as well as with sincerity; and wholly remote from all levity, or affectation of wit and humour: that "sound speech, which cannot be condemned," may put to shame and silence captious and malicious opposers. (Note, 1 Cor. 14:20—25. P. O. 12—25.)—As no rank in the community raises men above the minister's admonition, so none places them beneath his attention. The conduct of the meanest servant may disgrace, or it may "adorn, the doctrine of God our Saviour." The latter will be the happy effect, when servants, professing that doctrine, are "obedient to their masters," obliging in all things, "not answering again, not purloining, but showing all good fidelity." In this manner, they may acceptably and effectually recommend the gospel, and perhaps be instrumental to the salvation of their superiors. In these, and in all other things, it behooves every professed Christian to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour;" which alone can ensure that doctrine due respect in this evil world, or favourably attract the attention of those who "are without."

V. 11—15. The divine law teaches us godliness, righteousness, temperance, and universal holiness: but the "grace of God which bringeth salvation," alone "teaches us" sinners "to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." How greatly then are they mistaken, who would inculcate these practical subjects, without leading men's attention primarily to the mercy and grace of God in Christ, for instruction, motives, help, and encouragement: thus vainly expecting good fruit from the ungrafted crab-stock! As this "saving grace of our God hath appeared to all men," and to us in particular, "by the word of truth;" let us inquire, whether our whole dependence be placed upon that grace which saves the lost, pardons the guilty, and sanctifies the unclean: and whether we have inwardly been taught by it, as truly penitent, to hate, forsake, and "deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Whether we are daily mortifying our sins, following after holiness, and practising all our duties to God and man, in expectation that 'Christ will come to be our Judge;' and patiently continuing in well-doing, while we look for "that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ," to 'number us with his saints in glory everlasting.'—If we indeed believe, that Emmanuel "gave himself for us, to redeem" us from deserved and eternal misery, that he might also deliver us from Satan, and from "all iniquity, and purify us unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works;" we can want no further inducement to any kind or degree of self-denying obedience; provided we duly estimate his love, our obligations, and the assurance given us of all sufficient help, and every needful good. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 1 Pet. 1:17—22.) The more evidently we are "redeemed from all iniquity, and purified" unto Christ "as a peculiar people, zealous of good works;" the clearer will our evidence be of an interest in his righteousness and atonement and the brighter our hope of eternal felicity; and the further we are removed from boasting, or trusting in imaginary good works, that we may glory in Christ alone; the more zealous shall we become, of abounding in real good works, performed in an upright, humble, believing manner, to the glory of our Lord, and the benefit of his people, and of mankind. (Note, 3:8.) May all ministers speak these things decidedly, enforce them with earnestness, and "rebuke" opposers and perverters of the gospel, and also negligent Christians, "with all authority;" and may their doctrine and example secure them from the contempt of all men, except that of the avowed despisers of Christ and his salvation!

NOTES.—(CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. (Notes, Matt. 22:15—22. Rom. 13:1—7. 1 Tim. 2:1,2. 1 Pet. 2:13—17.) Titus was further instructed, to remind the Cretians, by reiterated exhortations, to obey those "principalities and powers," or civil governors, whom Providence had placed over them; and even the inferior magistrates appointed by them. These were idolaters, and generally oppressive and injurious: yet the apostle, during his short abode in Crete, had taught an unreserved subjection to them, except in matters of conscience towards God. But, as the Cretians would be apt to forget his admonitions, they were to be "stirred up in the way of remembrance;" that so no disgrace might be brought on the gospel, by the turbulent spirits and conduct of professed Christians.—They must also be directed "to be ready to every good work," showing a willing mind for any kind action, even to their heathen neighbours: not reviling or slandering any man, nor even propagating disadvantageous reports when true, unless there were a necessity: not "brawling," or wrangling with acrimony and vehemence, even against those who injured them; but acting with gentleness and meekness to all men.

V. 3. The preceding exhortations would inevitably thwart the natural inclinations of the Cretians; and therefore the apostle enforced them by an argument, which related to the state of Christians in general, before their conversion. (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Eph. 2:1—3. 1 Pet. 4:1—5.) Including himself, Titus, and all other Christians, among those in Crete, (for this is undeniably the plain meaning of the passage,) he argued, that they ought to bear with and be kind to their enemies, and patiently to endure their perverseness and injustice: for they themselves had experienced far greater patience and kindness from God; as "they had sometime, that is, before their conversion, "been foolish," ignorant of God, of themselves, and of divine truth; and had perversely preferred worldly things to true religion. In different ways they all had been "disobedient" to God, in their habitual conduct, and to those whom God had placed over them; having been "deceived" by Satan and their own hearts, and led to wander out of the right way. They had been "slaves to divers lusts, and" the love of worldly "pleasures;" some being under the power of one sinful passion, some of another (Notes, Rom. 6:12—20.) They had also lived "in malice and envy:" from the various competitions, animosities, and resentments, to which their eager persuit of worldly objects, and the pride of their hearts gave rise. Thus they had been "hateful" in their disposition and conduct in the sight of God; "and had hated one another," especially in the reciprocal contempt and enmity borne by the Jews and Gentiles against each other: and by the hatred of the persecutors against the persecuted. (Notes, 1 John 3:11—15.)

V. 4—7. God might justly have left even the apostle and Titus, with their brethren and fellow-labourers, to perish in their sins; as, before their conversion, they had not only deserved it, but had been "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction." (Note, Rom. 9:22,23.) Yet, he had not only spared them, but effected a most blessed change in their state and character. For the kindness and philanthropy of God, (his love to sinful men, while he left sinning angels to perish,) had given them ground to call him "God our Saviour;" as he had purposed, planned, and effected salvation for mankind, by giving his only Son to be their Redeemer. (Notes, 1:1—4. 2:13. Is. 12:1—3. 45:14—22.) After this "love of God to man" had been displayed in the incarnation, obedience, death, and resurrection of the eternal Son of God, and by the preaching of the gospel; he had also brought the apostle and his brethren to partake of the salvation: not through the merit or efficacy of "works of righteousness, which they had done," of whatever kind, or in any degree; but "according to his" unmerited and plenteous "mercy," and compassionate good-will to them; and by "the washing of regeneration," that "new birth of the Spirit," of which "the laver" of baptism was the sacramental sign, but nothing more. (Notes, John 3:3—8. Eph. 2:4—10. 1 Pet. 3:19—22.) This not only washed the heart from the prevailing love and pollution of sin, but made way for "the renewal" of the soul to the divine image, by the power of the Holy Spirit; (Notes, Rom. 12:2. Eph. 4:22—24. Col. 3:7—11.) which God the Father had richly and abundantly poured forth upon them, in all the variety of its gifts, graces, and consolations, "through Jesus Christ our Saviour." His ransom had purchased, and his mediation had obtained this inestimable gift for sinners, in order to impart salvation to their souls. Thus, being brought to repent, and believe in the Son of God, they had been "justified by his grace," without any of their own merits; (Note, Rom. 3:21—26. 5:1,2.) and so they became the adopted children and heirs of God, "according the hope of eternal life," which his promise had taught them to entertain. (Notes, 1:1—4. Rom. 5:1—5. 8:24—27, vv. 24,25. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 1 John 5:11,12.) Seeing then all their hopes and privileges had been conferred upon them, wholly by the mercy of God, contrary to all their own deserts; it was highly proper for them to be "followers of God," in their conduct towards their brethren and neighbours.—The miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit are not so much as alluded to in this place: and nothing induces more confusion and perplexity into the expositions given of the Scripture by commentators of different descriptions, than the neglect of distinguishing between those communications which constituted men prophets or apostles, and those which were, still are, and ever must be, indispensably necessary to render them true Christians.—The expression, "shed" or poured "on us," in this manifest allusion to the sacrament of baptism, may properly be noted, as an intimation that the pouring of water on any person, "in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit," is baptism equally with immersion. V. 8. "The saying," which the apostle had just delivered, concerning salvation to sinners, from the mercy of God in Christ, through regeneration, by faith, and gratuitous justification of grace, "was faithful:" and the doctrines which he had stated, as well as the exhortations before given, (for both seem to be referred to,) he would have Titus insist upon, with constancy and without wavering; in order that "those who had believed in God," and trusted in his mercy, grace, truth, and power, through Jesus Christ, might be rendered "careful to maintain," or to stand foremost in the practice of good works: being influenced by love and gratitude, and encouraged by the promises of the gospel to abound in them. For though the things before stated in various practical admonitions, could not in any degree justify sinners before God; they were "good' in themselves, and "profitable to men," in respect of their temporal and eternal interests, both to those who performed them, and to others. (Notes, Job 22:1—4. Ps. 16:2,3. 2 Cor. 9:12—15.)

V. 9. It was incumbent on Titus, to insist on the grand peculiarities of the gospel, and by all means to avoid frivolous and foolish questions, or subtile nice distinctions and "genealogies," to which the Jews were attached, as if men were the better in the sight of God for being descended from the patriarchs. These matters, and the contests and angry disputes of the Jewish teachers, about the Mosaic law, and the obligations of its ceremonies, were utterly vain under the Christian dispensation; and only amused men with such speculations, as took them off from the great doctrines and duties of Christianity.—The contrast between those things which "are good and profitable to men," (8) and "those which are unprofitable and vain," is worthy of observation. (Notes, 1:14—16. 1 Tim. 1:3—7. 4:6—10. 6:20,21. 2 Tim. 2:14—18.)

V. 10, 11. A heretic, in St. Paul's sense, seems to denote a professed Christian, who obstinately denies and opposes some fundamental doctrine of the gospel, as taught by the apostles; especially if he were earnest to propagate his notions, from a vain desire of being the head of a party, and so made divisions in the church. (Note, Gal. 5:19—21.) Titus was therefore directed to admonish the heretic once and again; showing him the error and evil tendency of his principles, and their corrupt source; warning him of his guilt and danger, and exhorting him to retract. If this failed of effect, he ought afterwards to reject him, as an excommunicated person: as his dangerous errors, and his pertinacious adherence to them, evinced him "to be subverted," or turned aside from Christ, the Foundation of the church, by the artifices of Satan; that his mistakes arose not from unavoidable ignorance, but from proud and carnal prejudices, so that he sinned in them; and that "he was condemned of himself," as his avowal of such heresies rendered further proof against him unnecessary. He was therefore not to be considered as a Christian, or allowed to continue in the communion of the church. The Scriptures referred to in the margin (Marg. Ref. p.) show, that when a man's own words suffice for his condemnation, without further evidence, he may be said to be "condemned of himself:" nor does any great difficulty appear in this much disputed text, except in explaining it in a manner consistent with the systems of contending zealots.—In subordinate matters the apostle inculcated mutual forbearance: but all his epistles show, that he supposed some errors to be fundamental, and absolutely inconsistent with faith in Christ. For pertinaciously maintaining these errors men ought to be excommunicated, as much as for gross immoralities: and were things restored to their primitive state in the church of Christ, there can be no doubt, that those who deny the ruined estate of man by nature, the Deity of Christ, the real atonement of his death, justification by faith in the merits of Christ, of grace and not of works the need of sanctification by the Holy Spirit, and of obedience to God's commandments, as the effect and evidence of justifying faith, with other doctrines of similar importance, would, after proper admonition, be rejected by the pastors of the church, and excluded from the communion of believers. No doubt would remain in their minds, tha such heretics were subverted and sinned; and their profession of tenets so destructive of Christianity, would be deemed a kind of "self-condemnation;" without considering them as less sincere in opposing the truth, than Saul of Tarsus was. They would not judge them proper persons to associate with those who believed the doctrines of Christianity: but yet they would not do them any injury in their temporal concerns, or refuse to aid them in distress: or neglect to pray for "God to give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth." The connexion, which has so long subsisted, between excommunication and persecution, has aided in giving occasion to a latitudinarian candour, and a laxity of discipline, to associate with men's ideas of toleration. But the fullest toleration does not imply, that all opinions should be regarded as alike right or probable: nor does excommunication imply, that any alteration should be made in men's civil circumstances. (Notes, Matt. 18:15—18. 1 Cor. 5:1—5,9—13. 2 John 7—11. Rev 2:20—23.) Some learned and ingenious men have indeed at length discovered that it is no sin to treat the word of God with neglect, contempt, or proud opposition; and that it is of little consequence what doctrines men believe! No wonder then, that they cannot explain the Scripture into an agreement with these tenets; or bring the word of God to declare its own insignificancy. But those who believe, that "men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil," and treat the truth of God as a lie, because it opposes their pride or lusts, will not find much difficulty in understanding, why such heretics should be separated from the society of believers: and they will chiefly lament, that it is not more generally practised, and more easily practicable; seeing it is evident, "that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump," in many churches which once seemed to flourish. V. 12—15. There were several cities called Nicopolis, (the city of victory,) especially one in Macedonia, and another in Epirus, and it is not certain which was here meant: but it hence appears that St. Paul was at this time at liberty. Had he written from Nicopolis, as the spurious postscript asserts, he would have said, "I have determined here to winter."—He purposed to send Artemas, or Tychicus, to inform Titus when to meet him there; and probably to supply his place in Crete: and he desired him to come without delay. But he was required to bring Zenas, (who was either a converted Jewish doctor of the law, or one who had been a Roman lawyer,) and Apollos, who seems to have been then in Crete: and he was studiously to help them, that by the kindness of the churches, their wants and travelling expenses might be supplied. Titus was also directed to remind the immediate friends of the apostle, and especially the ministers, that they should "learn to maintain," or to stand forward and distinguish themselves, in the practice of good works, for these and such like useful purposes; that they might not be unfruitful, but might set a good example to the new converts.—Some explain the words to mean, that they should learn and labour in "useful trades," which would enable them, though no emoluments were annexed to their office, to assist their brethren, and so in this respect not to be unfruitful. (Marg. Ref.)—With this admonition, and the customary salutations and benedictions, he concluded the epistle.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. It has at all times been necessary to remind Christians "to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates," and "to submit to one another in the fear of God;" (Notes, Eph. 5:21. 1 Pet. 5:5—7.) but it is peculiarly so at present, when most valuable privileges and liberties in this favoured land, which ought to have rendered cheerful subjection and peaceable obedience universal, among all who "name the name of Christ," have given occasion to a contrary spirit and conduct in numbers, who seem to forget, that most express precepts to this effect are found in the Scriptures. But real religion, in proportion as it prevails, will render believers quiet subjects, as well as good neighbours and relations, and "ready to every good work:" it will repress every turbulent and censorious temper, and restrain them from "speaking evil" of others, and from reviling and wrangling; and it will teach them to be gentle and meek to all men. These dispositions, and this conduct, are the genuine effects of a deep conviction of our own guilt, united with a believing and experimental knowledge of the salvation of the gospel.—We shall not, when really humbled and enlightened, disdain or be wearied out by the misconduct of the most unreasonable enemies: because we shall well remember, that we ourselves were formerly "foolish, disobedient, and deceived, slaves to divers" base lusts, and a fondness for carnal pleasures; "that we lived in malice and envy," and in short were hateful to God, and disposed to hate one another, and thus "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction," till divine grace effected the blessed change. Let us then often contemplate the discoveries which have been made of the "kindness and love of God our Saviour," towards our fallen apostate race, in "giving his Son to be the propitiation for our sins;" his patience in sparing us, during the years of our foolishness and rebellion; his goodness in sending us the word of salvation; and, to crown the whole, his mercy in causing us to partake of the "washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he poured upon" our souls, of his plenteous grace, through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Surely we know that none of these things were procured "by works of righteousness which we had done;" and that we are "justified freely by his grace, and so made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." Having been therefore brought into a state of safety, and made partakers of a joyful hope, by the mercy of God the Father, through the redemption of his incarnate Son, and by the new creation of the Holy Spirit; it certainly behooves us to "take the lead in every good work," by which we can glorify God our Saviour, or benefit mankind. (Note, Phil. 4:8,9.) Ministers should frequently and earnestly insist upon these "faithful sayings," and "affirm these things constantly;" and show the tendency of the truths of the gospel to holiness of life: and Christians should be ambitious of exceeding all other men in every good thing, for the honour of the truth through which they are saved. (Note, 2:14.)

V. 9—15. Attending to "the good and profitable" things before inculcated, we should learn to avoid "foolish questions" and contentious disputations, which "are unprofitable and vain." But, though we must not strive about words, or magnify every difference of opinion into a "damnable heresy;" yet we should carefully watch against fundamental errors, which are inconsistent with "the life of faith in the Son of God," and of grateful obedience to him. Many are subverted by heretics; we should therefore "withdraw from them," if they neglect proper admonitions: and though they should not be separated from the communion of believers here; yet, continuing impenitent, they will at last be rejected by the omniscient Judge of all men. Whatever Christians "find to do," they should attend on it diligently: (Note, Ec. 9:10.) they ought to be ever ready to help one another; and to prevent and relieve the wants of those who are labouring to promote the gospel. (Note, 3 John 5—8. P. O. 1—8.) Those who exhort others to such good works, must learn to maintain them in their own conduct; and, on proper occasions, to set a decided and conspicuous example. Then they will not be unfruitful in the knowledge of Christ; mutual love as the fruit of faith will be increased; and "the grace of our Lord will be with them all."

PHILEMON.

[a]PHILEMON seems to have been a Christian of some eminence, residing at Colossè, (Note, 1,2.—Col. 4:9,17.) who had been converted under St. Paul's ministry; (19) perhaps during his abode at Ephesus. (Acts 19:10.)—When the apostle was imprisoned at Rome, Onesimus, a slave of Philemon, having, as it is generally thought, been guilty of some dishonesty, left his master and fled to that city, though at the distance of several hundred miles. When he came thither, curiosity, or some similar motive, induced him to attend on St. Paul's ministry, which it pleased God to bless for his conversion. After he had given very satisfactory proof of a real change, and manifested an excellent disposition by a suitable behaviour, which had greatly endeared him to the apostle; he judged it proper to send him back to his master, to whom he wrote this epistle, in order to procure Onesimus a more favourable reception, than he could otherwise have expected.—The most competent judges have given it a decided preference, as a model of good writing in the epistolary kind, to the most admired remains of antiquity. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive, how such a cause as that of Onesimus, could have been pleaded in a more interesting, obliging, prudent, pathetic, and masterly manner. It is also very replete with useful instruction.—The apostle entertained no doubt of Philemon's compliance with his request; and expected that he would do more than he said. It is therefore probable, that Onesimus was not only received into favour, but set at liberty; and it is generally thought, that he became afterwards a minister of the gospel. Onesimus accompanied Tychicus to Colossè, and, it may be concluded, that the apostle wrote to Philemon at the same time; and that Onesimus, having delivered the letter to his master, and obtained his forgiveness, joined with Tychicus, in executing the apostle's commission to the Colossians.

A. D. 64.

The apostle salutes Philemon, 1—3; declares his joy at hearing of his faith and love, 4—7; earnestly and pathetically entreats him to receive into favour his fugitive servant, Onesimus, now become, by the apostle's ministry, a consistent believer, 8—21; desires him to provide for him a lodging, as he expected to be speedily released, 22; and concludes with salutations and benedictions, 23—25.

3 [g]Grace to you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

4 I [h]thank my God, making mention of [i]thee always in my prayers,

5 [j]Hearing of thy love and faith, which thou hast [k]toward the Lord Jesus, and toward all saints;

6 That [l]the communication of thy faith may become effectual, by [m]the acknowledging of every good thing which is [n]in you in Christ Jesus.

7 For we have [o]great joy and consolation in thy love, because [p]the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother.

8 Wherefore, though I might be much [q]bold in Christ to [r]enjoin thee that which is convenient,

9 Yet for [s]love's sake I rather beseech thee, being such a one as [t]Paul the aged, and now also [u]a prisoner of Jesus Christ.

10 I beseech thee for [x]my son, [y]Onesimus, [z]whom I have begotten in my bonds;

NOTES.—V. 1, 2. The apostle did not intend to write authoritatively to Philemon, and therefore he only styled himself "a prisoner of Jesus Christ:" (Notes, 8—11. Eph. 3:1—7. 4:1—6.) which tended to procure an affectionate regard to him; and he joined Timothy with him, that his request might be presented as the united desire of him and his brethren. Though Philemon is called "a fellow-labourer," it is not certain that he was a minister; perhaps he served the cause of Christ by active diligence in another manner. (Note, Phil. 4:1—3.) The beloved Apphia is generally supposed to have been his wife, though some think that she was his sister. Archippus, whom the apostle called his "fellow-soldier," and to whom he sent a special charge in another epistle, (Note, Col. 4:17.) is thought to have been the son or near relation of Philemon: and he seems to have resided in his family, which was so pious and well regulated, that it was in some respects a Christian church. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 18:19,20. Rom. 16:3,4.)

Fellow-soldier. (2) Συστρατιωτῃ. Phil. 2:25.

V. 3. (Marg. Ref. Note, Rom. 1:5—7.) 'Hence it appears, that the nature of the Father, and of the Son, is the same: seeing the Son can do that which the Father doeth, and the Father is said to do that which the Son doeth.' Jerome.

V. 4—7. The apostle thanked God continually for his grace bestowed on Philemon, of whom he made "mention continually in his prayers." His gratitude to the Lord was excited from time to time by the good accounts which he received of Philemon's "love and faith," even "his faith toward the Lord Jesus," and his love to him and "to all the saints" for his sake. (Notes, 2 Cor. 8:6—9. Gal. 5:1—6. Eph. 1:15—23. Col. 1:3—8.) The obvious meaning of the passage requires a transposition of the words, which arise from an arrangement, not at all unsuitable to the Greek language, though it appears rather harsh in an English translation. The apostle also prayed, "that the communication of Philemon's faith might become effectual, &c." Some explain this of his liberal communication from his temporal affluence, being made "effectual" for the relief of the saints, and for the evident demonstration of his faith, from which it sprang. Others suppose the apostle to mean, that his "communion," or participation of faith in Christ, might be effectual in regulating his own temper and conduct. But, though both these senses may be contained in the words, they seem to have a still further meaning. The apostle probably prayed, that Philemon's endeavours to "communicate" his faith in Christ to those around him, might be rendered effectual, through the evident excellency of his own example, and that of his family: so that men might be induced to acknowledge the reality and value "of every good thing which was in them," by means of their relation to Christ; and thus to entertain a favourable opinion of that religion which produced such beneficial effects on the conduct of those who embraced it. (Notes, Matt. 5:14—16. 1 Pet. 2:12.) This he trusted would be the case; for he "had great joy" and comfort in the accounts that he heard of his liberal love, by which the urgent necessities of Christians and ministers were supplied: so that, while their bodies were refreshed at his expense, their hearts were also rejoiced by his good example and pious conversation: and therefore the apostle cordially owned him, and greatly loved him, as his brother in the gospel. The word "brother," placed thus at the end of a sentence, is peculiarly emphatical, and expressive of the most entire cordiality.

V. 8—11. The apostle here enters on the immediate design of the epistle. When he considered his own apostolical authority, and Philemon's character; he supposed that he might, with propriety, have "enjoined" him, in the name of Christ, to do what was so evidently "convenient," or agreeable to the loving spirit of Christianity: yet he preferred the language of a supplicant, in the present case, and besought Philemon, "for love's sake," even the love of Christ to them, and their love to him, and to each other through him, that he would grant him one special favour, which he had it much at heart to obtain. He would remind him, that his humble supplicant was "such a one as Paul the aged," (for he was probably above sixty years old at this time;) and "also a prisoner of Jesus Christ." For having, as a minister of the gospel, encountered numberless afflictions and perils, in seeking the salvation of men's souls, he was then enduring the hardships of a long imprisonment in the cause of Christ; and he could not doubt of Philemon's readiness to do any thing proper, which might mitigate the severity of his sufferings. His petition indeed was not presented for himself: but it was in behalf of "his son," even of one "whom he had begotten in his bonds," "the son of his old age," for whom he had the most tender parental affection; and this son was "Onesimus!" In the original, Onesimus is mentioned at the close of the sentence; that the suspense and most affectionate introduction, might prepare Philemon to read a name, which could scarcely fail of being associated in his mind with unfavourable ideas. "Onesimus" signifies profitable; in allusion to which, the apostle allowed that he had not formerly deserved that name, having been "unprofitable;" probably he had been unfaithful, dishonest, and unruly; perhaps addicted to other vices. This the apostle seems to have known from his own confession. But he spake of his faults in the gentlest language, and hastened to mention the change which had taken place; and by which his character was now made to answer the meaning of his name: so that he was become "profitable" both to Philemon and to the apostle. He was prepared to be a useful servant to the former; he had been serviceable to the latter, and he hoped that he would be still more so.

I might be much bold, &c. (8) Πολλην παρρησιαν εχων. See on John 7:4.—To enjoin.] Επιτασσειν. Mark 1:27. 6:27. Acts 23:2. Επιταγη. V. 12—16. Onesimus was Philemon's legal property, and St. Paul had required and prevailed with Onesimus to return to him, having made sufficient trial of his sincerity; and he requested Philemon to receive him with the same kindness as he would the aged apostle's "own son according to the flesh;" being equally dear to him, as his spiritual child. He would gladly have kept him at Rome, to minister to him in his confinement; which Onesimus would willingly have done, in the bonds of the gospel, being attached to him from Christian love and gratitude: and, as he knew that Philemon would joyfully have done him any service in person, if he had been at Rome; so he would have considered Onesimus, as ministering to him in his master's stead. But he would not do any thing of this kind without his consent; lest he should seem to extort the benefit, and Philemon should appear to act from "necessity," rather than "from a willing mind." (Notes, 2 Cor. 9:1—7.)—He had indeed hopes of deriving benefit from Onesimus's faithful service, at some future period, by Philemon's free consent: yet he was not sure that this was the Lord's purpose respecting him; for perhaps he permitted him to leave his master for a season, in so improper a manner, in order that, being converted, he might be received on his return with such affection, and might abide with Philemon with such faithfulness and diligence, that they should choose to live together the rest of their lives, as fellow-heirs of eternal felicity. (Marg. Ref. i.) In this case he knew that Philemon would no longer consider Onesimus merely as a slave, but view him as "above a slave, even as a brother beloved." This he was become to Paul in an especial manner, who had before been entirely a stranger to him: how much more then might it be supposed, that he would be endeared to Philemon, when he became well acquainted with his excellency; seeing he would be near to him, both in the flesh, as one of his domestics, and in the Lord, being one with him in Christ as a believer!

Bowels. (12) Σπλαγχνα. See on Luke 1:78.

V. 17—21. If Philemon deemed the apostle "a partner," or partaker of the same grace, and dear to him for Christ's sake; let him express his love to him by receiving Onesimus with as much kindness as he would have received Paul himself if he had come in person: and, in case Onesimus had wronged Philemon, or was in his debt; let him place that to his account: and, as he wrote the epistle with his own hand, he gave, as it were, a promissory note, that he would repay it upon demand.—It is generally observed, that this is a plain instance of a debt being imputed to one, which was contracted by another; and of one, by a voluntary engagement becoming answerable for the misconduct of another; that the latter might be exempted from the punishment due to his crimes, and partake of benefits to which he had no right. This accords to the doctrine of Christ's voluntary bearing the punishment of our sins, that we might receive the reward of his righteousness, by a reciprocal imputation.—Perhaps, the apostle understood that Philemon had expressed some sharpness concerning Onesimus's conduct; or suspicion of his sincerity in his professed repentance; or knowing him to be naturally somewhat severe in his temper, he might fear lest he should punish him, as the laws permitted masters to do their slaves in such cases; which would not only have been grievous to Onesimus, but disgraceful to the gospel, and to Philemon himself. He therefore so far interested himself in the matter: though he could scarcely suppose that payment would be demanded of him; and he added, that, in making this proposal, he had forborne to bring into the account, that Philemon "owed to him his ownself," in an especial manner, as God had made him the instrument of his eternal salvation; thus intimating that he never could sufficiently requite that obligation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:14—17. Jam. 5:19,20.) He therefore pathetically besought him to let him have an opportunity of "rejoicing on his account," in the Lord's kindness to him; and to grant him this request, which would as much refresh his compassionate heart, as Philemon's liberality did "the bowels of the saints." (Note, 4—7.) Having confidence that he was ready to obey the Lord's will, which had been intimated by him, he had written to him, being assured that he would do even more than he had requested.—Our curiosity is not gratified by being informed of the effect of this epistle: yet we can hardly doubt, that Philemon forgave Onesimus, received him with kindness, remitted what he owed to him, and afterwards gave him his liberty, that he might attend on the apostle. His appointment with Tychicus to deliver the epistle to the Colossians seems to intimate, that Paul meant to employ him as a minister, which probably was afterwards done.

A partner. (17) Κοινωνον. See on Luke 5:10. (Note, 1 John 1:3,4.)—Put that on mine account. (18) Τουτο εμοι ελλογει. Rom. 5:13.—Owest . . . besides. (19) Προσοφειλεις. Insuper debes. 'Owest to me above others.'—Have joy of thee. (20) Οναιμην. Here only. Note, 8—11.

V. 22—25. The apostle, though at this time in bonds, had an expectation of being speedily released, when he wrote this epistle, and he purposed to visit Philemon and the Colossians, when that took place. He was persuaded they did not forget to pray for his liberty, that he might be enabled to visit them, and he trusted, that in answer to their prayers, this would soon be effected; therefore he desired them to prepare him a convenient lodging.—This circumstance would add energy to his request in behalf of Onesimus.—Epaphras attended Paul so closely, that he might be deemed his fellow-prisoner; or perhaps he was imprisoned with him. (Marg. Ref. Note, Acts 20:25—27. Prefaces to 1 Timothy and 2 Timothy.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. The "fellow-labourers" and "fellow-soldiers" of Christ, ought to "pray and to thank God" for each other, with the greatest constancy and fervency: for faith in Christ, and love to him, should unite saints more closely, than any outward relation can the people of the world. (Notes, 1 Pet. 1:22—25.) Those who partake of this blessedness, must and will desire to communicate it to others; and their endeavours will be rendered effectual, through fervent prayer, and by a uniform course of piety, purity, integrity, and benevolence; which will constrain men to "acknowledge the good things which are in them" as believers in Christ.—Faithful ministers have great joy and comfort in that little company of affluent Christians, whose "love abounds" in liberality to all men: and when "the bowels of the saints are refreshed by them," and their wants generously supplied.—It is by no means proper to exercise authority on every occasion; even when ministers may be "bold to enjoin what is convenient." It is frequently far more prudent, for love's sake, to beseech even juniors and inferiors; especially when it may be supposed, that they will be reluctant to what is required, and when it may be difficult to convince them of its indispensable obligation. These requests, from such a one as in any good measure resembles "Paul the aged," will have the energy of injunctions, and engage compliance, without risking a subsequent distaste; which is always, in such cases, to be feared from the remaining self-love of the human heart; even in respect of pious men, who would do much to alleviate the sufferings, or increase the comforts, of their faithful pastors. In such circumstances, wisdom and humility will teach the aged and experienced to become willingly the obliged parties, when they might assume a higher tone.—In speaking to persons about their sins, for their humiliation, the heinous nature and manifold aggravations of them should be insisted on: but in mentioning them to others, who are disposed to severity or resentment, we should soften and extenuate as far as truth will permit: and the subject ought to be introduced with all the tenderness and caution imaginable, that every thing may tend to conciliate, and nothing to exasperate.—When penitents show their sincerity by "works meet for repentance," they should be treated by ministers with parental tenderness; and taken under their patronage, in respect of the temporal consequences of their former sins. For in this manner, those "who were unprofitable" to their relatives and neighbours, and a trouble to all connected with them, are made "profitable" to the community and to the church of God. (Note, Mark 5:14—20. P. O. 14—20.) They often become greatly useful to ministers and their families, and a blessing to all among whom they reside; they supply other men's lack of service, to the suffering disciples of Christ, by tending on them in their stead; they promote the gospel by their example, conversation, and prayers; and some of them become preachers of the word of life to their fellow-sinners: for "behold all things are become new."—No prospect of usefulness should induce ministers to allow their converts to neglect relative obligations, or to fail of obedience to their superiors. One great evidence of true repentance consists in returning to the practice of those duties which had been neglected: and even liberty to engage in other services should be sought from those concerned; not as it were of necessity, but by their willing consent. We know not for what services God may intend those, whom he has marvellously converted; having therefore given our judgment, and used proper means, we should leave all things to his determination, in whose hand are the hearts of all the children of men.

V. 17—25. Little do men know for what purposes the Lord leaves them to change their situations, or engage in enterprises, from worldly or criminal motives. We should have thought, that Onesimus's departure from his master, would have been final, and his journey to Rome ruinous; yet the Lord had far other and more gracious purposes concerning him: (Note, Gen. 50:20.) and had he not overruled, in a similar manner, some of our ungodly projects, the writer and many readers may say, with humble gratitude, our destruction must have been the inevitable consequence; though, through that gracious interposition, they eventually proved the occasion of our being brought into the way of salvation and of usefulness. When we read of Onesimus's conversion at Rome, after having grown worse and worse, as it is probable, in Philemon's pious family; we should learn to despair of none, but still to use means, and offer prayers for them: and we should be ever ready to receive the penitent, with that kindness which God shows to his returning prodigals. (Note, Luke 15:20—24.) This should especially be attended to, in our conduct towards relations or domestics; whose conversion should be doubly welcome, notwithstanding their past misconduct, that they may be near to us, and beloved by us, "in the flesh, and in the Lord."—Ministers should, in such cases, love to be peacemakers; (Note, Matt. 5:9.) and they ought to give up their own interest, in order to prevail with offended parents or masters, to be reconciled to their penitent children or servants; that so the severity, animosity, and division may be prevented, by which the gospel is often disgraced. When such offenders have wronged others, or owe what they cannot pay, it may sometimes be proper for us to pay it for them, if we can; as followers of Christ who "bare our sins in his own body on the tree." Thus we shall best prevail with our brethren, to use lenity and forbearance: especially when we deal with those who "owe their own selves" to the blessing of God on our ministry: and such persons ought to be reminded to let their loving pastors "have joy of them in the Lord," to refresh their hearts, to answer their confidence, and even to do more than modesty will permit them to request. Then their prayers for each other will be more fervent: and, in answer to them, their meetings on earth will be comfortable and cordial: but even if this be denied, "the grace of the Lord Jesus will be with their spirits," and they will soon meet before the throne, to join for ever in admiring the riches of redeeming love.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

THE general testimony of antiquity, the current tradition of the church, and the judgment of the most competent modern critics, determine this epistle to have been written by the apostle Paul; though some, both in former and latter times, have thought otherwise. '"The epistle of Paul." Thus we find it written in all our manuscripts, one only excepted, in which it is only, "The epistle to the Hebrews."' Beza.—'It is evident, that this epistle was generally received in ancient times, by those Christians who used the Greek language, and lived in the eastern parts of the Roman empire. In particular, Clement of Alexandria, before the end of the second century, received this epistle as St. Paul's, and quoted it frequently, and without any doubt or hesitation.—It is not expressly quoted as St. Paul's, by any of the Latin writers in the three first centuries. However, it was known to Irenæus and Tertullian.—It is manifest, that it was received as an epistle of St. Paul, by many Latin writers in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries.' Lardner.—Origen, who held some peculiar notions concerning it, says, 'The ancients did not rashly hand it down as St. Paul's.'—'It is very certain, that the churches and writers, who were ancients with respect to Origen, must have conversed with the apostles themselves, or at least with their successors.—Since this tradition was ancient, in the times of Clement of Alexandria and Origen, about a hundred and thirty years after the epistle was written; it must have had its rise in the days of Paul himself, and so cannot reasonably be contested.' Hallet in Macknight.—The doubts, which have been entertained on this subject, seem principally to have arisen from the circumstance of the apostle's name not being affixed to it, according to his custom in all his other epistles.—'If it is not to be considered as Paul's, because it does not bear his name; let it belong to no one, because it bears no name. But, on the contrary, I contend, from this very circumstance, that it belongs to Paul rather than to any other person. For why should any other person have omitted his name? But Paul had a sufficient reason for sending an anonymous letter to Jerusalem: not, as I think, because he was the peculiar apostle of the Gentiles, as Peter of the circumcision: but because he knew his name was greatly hated at Jerusalem by the enemies of Christianity, and that their fury was even then raging; and was perhaps exasperated by occasion of his imprisonment: (10:33,34.) he was therefore unwilling to inflame them against the church by affixing his name.' Beza.—'As Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, in writing to the Hebrews, he did not assume his apostolical character; because it was little respected by the unbelieving Jews and Judaizing Christians.—It being designed, not for the believing Jews alone, but for the unbelieving part of the nation, especially the learned doctors and scribes at Jerusalem, Paul might think it prudent, not only to avoid assuming his apostolical character, but even to conceal his name, ... which ... would have prejudiced the unbelieving part of the nation to such a degree, that, in all probability, they would not have read his letter.' Macknight.—The apostle intended to prove the doctrines of Christianity, and the changes which it had introduced, and would introduce, to be entirely consistent with "the oracles of God," as received by the Jews; and either clearly predicted, or evidently typified, or at least sufficiently intimated, by them; so that any man, who fully understood the Old Testament, must have expected the substance of what was taught by Christ and his apostles, and the events which had occurred. It is, therefore, highly probable, that he expressly aimed to write an epistle, which might be put into the hands either of Judaizing Christians, or unbelieving Jews, and read by them, without any prejudice, on account of the person who wrote it: let them impartially consider his arguments. (Preface to Esther.) It is however evident, that he supposed some of the Hebrews would know from whom it came. (10:34. 13:18,23,24.) But these intimations are not given till the argumentative part of the epistle is ended; and they would not be clearly understood by any but the apostle's friends.—The writer's connexion with Timothy, and his residence in Italy, tend to confirm the ancient tradition: and the other objections, as the supposition that the style is more elegant than St. Paul's; and that he uses expressions, which imply that he received his doctrine from those who heard Christ, and not by immediate revelation, &c. appear very vague and frivolous. He might, perhaps, bestow more pains in this epistle, concerning the style, than he did when he wrote to other churches: but, in fact, many competent judges are of opinion, that it is not more elegant. Certainly the internal evidence, arising from the writer's manner of expressing himself, and his reasoning, and things of a similar nature, corroborate the opinion, that St. Paul was the author: and if he thought it prudent to write as a converted Jew to his countrymen, and not as an apostle, who insisted on his authority; he must of course join himself with the other Jewish converts, and not distinguish himself from them, as having received his doctrine immediately from Christ. (Comp. 2:4. with 1 Pet. 4 3)

Origen and some others were of opinion, that the epistle was written in the Hebrew or Syriac language; and translated into Greek by Clement, or Luke: but if this had been the case, it can hardly be supposed, that no one copy of the Hebrew epistles should be mentioned as extant in their days, and as seen by them.—The quotations from the Old Testament are generally taken from the Septuagint, even where that version in some degree varies from the Hebrew: but this would scarcely have taken place, had the epistle been written in Hebrew.—The Hebrew names are interpreted also in Greek, in a manner that is not at all like the addition of a translator. The apostle, doubtless, supposed that the epistle would circulate widely among his countrymen, who spoke Greek and among Christians in general, as well as among the Hebrews: and therefore, probably, he wrote in Greek, as more generally in use at that time, than any other language in the world: and as it seems to have been written principally for the more learned of the Hebrews, and the teachers in the first instance; the circumstance, that the unlearned in Judea could not read it, would not counterbalance the advantages of its being legible by such numbers in every other place. For even in Judea the teachers would make it known to the common people: and the time was at hand when both Jews and Christians would be removed from the settlements in that country.—The Hebrews were the Jews in Judea, and those who spoke a dialect of the Hebrew: and to such of them, as professed Christianity, the epistle was addressed; and probably sent to Jerusalem, to the rulers and pastors of the church in that city: yet, the writer evidently expected, that the unconverted Jews also would read it: and their conviction and instruction seem to have been a leading part of his object in writing it.—It opens with a declaration of the personal and mediatorial dignity of Christ, and proofs from the Old Testament that the Messiah was to be far greater than the angels. It then shows his superiority to Moses and other eminent men of the nation; proves, by the most unanswerable arguments, that in him the types of the law had their full accomplishment; that he was the substance of all those shadows; and that the ancient Scriptures taught Israel to expect an entirely new dispensation, priesthood, and covenant, under the reign of the Messiah. These reasonings are interspersed and closed with most solemn and affectionate warnings and exhortations, addressed to different descriptions of persons. At length the writer shows the nature, efficacy, and triumphs of faith; by which all the saints in former ages had been accepted by God, and enabled to obey, suffer, and do exploits in defence of their holy religion: after which he adds various instructions, admonitions, encouragements, and exhortations: and then concludes with the customary salutations and benedictions.—The internal excellency of this epistle, as connecting the Old Testament and the New in the most convincing and instructive manner, and elucidating both more fully than any other epistle, or perhaps than all of them, added to other arguments, puts the divine inspiration of it beyond doubt: we here find the great doctrines, which we have elsewhere been considering, stated, proved, and applied to practical purposes, with peculiar animation, energy, and persuasion. It is supposed to have been written at the close of the apostle's first imprisonment at Rome, when he either was set at liberty, or daily expected it.

CHAPTER I.

The writer declares the essential Deity and mediatorial glory of the Son of God, by whom the Father speaks to men under the gospel dispensation, 1—4. He adduces several scriptures to prove, that the Messiah was to be far greater than the angels, and worshipped by them as their Creator and Lord, 5—14.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The Hebrews allowed the divine authority of the Old Testament; and therefore the writer of this epistle waved the mention of his apostolical authority, and reasoned with them principally from their own scriptures: and he thought it best to conceal his name; that none might be deterred by it from reading his arguments, or induced to receive them with prejudice. He therefore entered upon his subject without any introduction.—God, "the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Israel," who in former ages had spoken to the progenitors of the Hebrews, from the calling of Abraham, to the latter times of their nation "by the prophets," mere men of the same fallen nature with their brethren; who had gradually made known his truth and will, from time to time, through successive generations; and who had spoken to "the prophets," in divers methods, by personal conference, by dreams and visions, or by supernatural impulses upon their minds; had, "in the last days," under the dispensation of the gospel, "spoken to them by his Son," appearing personally among them in human nature.—The eternal Word, or Son, of God had indeed appeared, and spoken to the patriarchs, prophets, and others: but he then spoke as JEHOVAH, as God, to a few individuals, by whom his will was made known to their brethren: (Note, Phil. 2:5—8.) whereas he had at length "become flesh, and dwelt among" men, and among the Jews almost exclusively, to fulfil ancient prophecies and promises, and to give the most complete and explicit revelation of God, and of his truth and will, to mankind; as well as to procure salvation for them. (Notes, John 1:14—18. Rom. 15:8—13.) So that, while Moses and other mere men were the prophets of the old dispensation; "the only begotten Son of God," appearing in human nature, was the great prophet of the new dispensation. (Note. 3:1—5.)—This glorious Person the Father had appointed "Heir of all things." As the coequal Son of God, the government of all worlds by original right was vested in him: possessing the essential perfections of the Deity, he was capable of exercising universal authority, which no mere creature could have done; and he had been appointed by the Father, in respect of his assumed manhood, to rule over all worlds on the mediatorial throne, with uncontrolled dominion and unrivalled glory. Thus he inherited all things; and no creature could have any inheritance of power, honour, or felicity, except as derived from him, and held in subordination to him. (Notes, 2:5—9. Ps. 2:7—12. Is. 9:6,7. Matt. 28:18. John 5:20—24. Rom. 14:10—12. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Eph. 1:15—23. Phil. 2:9—11.) This appointment had the more evident propriety, in that "by him also God made the worlds:" being One with the Father and the eternal Spirit, in essence, power, and counsel, he had been the immediate Creator of the heavens and the earth, and of every order of beings in the universe. (Notes, Prov. 8:22—30. John 1:1—3. 1 Cor. 8:4—6. Col. 1:15—17.) The idea of a created agent, by whom God made all things, which some have endeavoured to support from this text, is so absurd in itself, as well as contrary to other scriptures, that it is astonishing it could ever have been adopted. (Notes, Is. 44:24. 45:12,13.) The apostle evidently meant, that God now spake to men, by that same glorious Person, who had been the immediate Creator of the world, and who was also exalted to the mediatorial throne, as "Heir of all things." 'I believe, it is as impossible to understand how a man should have this empire over all things in heaven and earth, and over death itself, and yet be a mere man; as it is to understand any mystery of the sacred Trinity.' Whitby.

begotten Son," of whom the writer spoke, had been appointed to make known his glory and perfections: being "one with the Father," and equal to him in the divine nature; and being also distinct from him, as to his personal subsistence. By assuming human nature he became "the brightness of the divine glory," or the shining forth of the glory of God to mankind; and he so made known the perfections of the Godhead to them, that "he who saw the Son saw the Father also." (Notes, John 5:17—19. 10:26—31,32—39. 12:44—50. 14:7—14. 17:20,21.) For the Son was "the express Image," or the character of the Father's Person, or subsistence; and showed every part of the nature and perfections of God to man, with the greatest exactness and in the most effectual manner possible; so that in proportion as any man knows Christ, in his Person, character, and salvation, he knows the Father also: and he that knows not Christ, has no real knowledge of God. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. Luke 10:21,22. 2 Cor. 4:3—6. Col. 1:15—17. 1 John 2:20—25.) Not only did the Father create the world by the Son, but the same divine Agent still "upholds all things by the word of his power," as one in the unity of the Godhead with the Father; and he even upheld all things in being, and in their settled order, by his almighty word and will, when he appeared on earth as the visible "Effulgence of the Father's glory, and the Character of his subsistence;" of which he gave many proofs in his miraculous power over the course of nature, over legions of evil spirits, over diseases, and death. Yet this same Person, who created the world, and "upholds all things by the word of his power," having become the High-Priest of his people, by himself purged away their guilt with the sacrifice of his death upon the cross. Then, having risen as a mighty Conqueror over death and hell, he ascended in human nature, to be seated as "Heir of all things" upon the mediatorial throne, at the "right hand of the Father," where he displays his glorious majesty. There the incarnate Son is enthroned in pre-eminent dignity, as "the Head over all things to his church," "which he purchased with his own blood." (Notes, 1,2. Acts 20:28. Col. 1:18—20.) For he was made so much "better than the angels," or superior in authority to them; that they were all rendered subject to him, as reigning in human nature; seeing he "inherited," as "the only begotten Son of God," "a more excellent name," or nature, than they: for, however exalted any of them were, in capacity or authority, they were only mere creatures, and he their infinite Creator. (Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. Eph. 1:15—23. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 1 Pet. 3:21, 22. Rev. 5:11—14.) This interpretation coincides with that which has already been given of similar passages; but it differs in some degree from that of several eminent evangelical expositors: for they suppose that the expressions, "the Brightness of his glory," and "the character of his subsistence," are illustrations, taken from external objects, of the eternal generation of Christ, and his equality with the Father in the Godhead. But though the author is decidedly of opinion, that Christ is called the only Son of God, in respect of his divine nature; and therefore allows the eternal generation, as well as the equality of the Son with the Father: yet he does not think that the Scripture contains any illustrations of these mysteries; or that we are taught to form any ideas of the manner in which they subsist: but rather to receive them in implicit faith, as the revelation of God, and to adore them as absolutely incomprehensible by us in our present state. He, therefore, supposes these expressions to signify the manifestation of the glory, character, and perfection of "the invisible God" to man, in and by the Person of his incarnate Son; whose original equality with the Father in his divine nature; and his voluntary assumption of the human nature, concurred in rendering him the proper medium, so to speak, through which we might see the "effulgency," or shining forth of the divine glory; and become acquainted with the perfections and subsistence of God, in the best manner of which in our present condition we are capable. He is also confirmed in this view of the passage, by finding, that the venerable reformer Beza, interprets it in the same manner, and makes the same objections to the other interpretations: except, that he translates the word ὑποστασις, persona, "person;" I think, improperly, for the subsistence of the Deity, not the personal distinction of the Father and the Son, seems to be intended.

V. 5—7. In the preceding verses, the apostle had stated the outlines of that doctrine on which he meant more largely to discourse: and, having declared the personal and mediatorial superiority and high pre-eminence of "the Son of God" above angels; he proceeded to show, that the Old Testament prophecies spake of the promised Messiah in similar language. As we are satisfied by abundant evidence, that the writers of the New Testament were equally inspired with those of the Old; their expositions are to us of equal authority with the original passages which they adduce. But when the apostle reasoned with the Hebrews out of their scriptures; he doubtless quoted them in that sense in which most of them had been used to understand them, or in which it might be proved they ought to be understood. Had not the more learned Jews, at the time when the epistle was written, been accustomed to understand the texts here brought forward, in the sense which the apostle affixes to them; he would scarcely have adduced them as proofs of his doctrine, without hesitation, in an argumentative treatise, which he knew must pass the ordeal of the strictest examination, by the most prejudiced and hostile persons. Now, if they were sufficient proofs to the persons immediately addressed, they must be sufficient for all, who consider the writer as fully knowing, by divine inspiration, both the doctrine of Christ, and the true meaning of the Scriptures: though the context might otherwise, in some instances, have led us to suppose them instructive accommodations; and though the Jews, in subsequent ages, to evade the writer's conclusion, have (as it might previously have been expected) attempted to put another construction on them.—We have before briefly considered the scriptures quoted; yet it is necessary here again to examine them. The first is brought from an evident prophecy of the Messiah's kingdom. JEHOVAH had in it addressed the Messiah, in such language, as had never been used to any angel. The words quoted were spoken above a thousand years before the birth of Jesus, and were the declaration of a preceding decree: they must therefore relate to his Sonship, or eternal generation; for the subsequent production of his human nature, by the power of the Holy Spirit, would not give him that essential and original superiority to the angels, which the argument here evidently required. Nor could his appointment to the office of Messiah be meant by the words, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee:" as that appointment was the consequence, rather than the cause, of his superiority to the angels; he was advanced above them, "as he had inherited a more excellent name than they:" and his Sonship is plainly denoted to be a participation of the Father's nature; and not merely a communication of existence by an act of creating power, or adoption by an act of special grace. (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12. Acts 13:24—37.)—The next quotation appears primarily to have been meant of Solomon; (Note, 2 Sam. 7:12—16.) but Solomon was a most remarkable type of the Messiah, as the Jews in general must know: so that when JEHOVAH said of him in so peculiar and distinguishing a sense, "I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son;" it must be obvious that this, in its fullest meaning, was to be understood of the Antitype rather than of the type.—The next proof was brought from a prophecy of the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom, in which it is said, "Worship him all ye gods." (Note, Ps. 97:3—7.) JEHOVAH there spoke of "bringing in" the Messiah; whom he had elsewhere declared to be his "First-begotten Son;" and appointed to be "Heir of all things:" and at the same time he called upon the most exalted of his creatures to "submit to the Son," to adore and "honour him, even as they honoured the Father that sent him." (Note, Rev. 5:11—14.) For, though the magistrates and grandees of the earth might be included, yet all the angels of God were evidently intended also. But JEHOVAH had never spoken in such language concerning angels; of whom it had been said, that he made them "spirits," or winds, (for so it may be rendered,) and as "flames of fire" to be his ministering servants. (Notes, 2 Kings 2:11. 6:15—17. Ps. 104:4. Is. 6:1—4.)—He had indeed formed them active, powerful, pure, and spiritual intelligences, to perform his mandates, with inexpressible force and fervent love: but he had never commanded other rational creatures to worship them: nay, he had most peremp torily forbidden the worship of any creature: yet he required the most exalted of them to worship his Son, even when brought into this world to dwell in human nature! A most decided proof of an infinite disparity between Christ and the highest angels. (Note, Rev. 19:9,10.)—"When he introduceth the First-born into the world, he saith, "Let all God's messengers worship him:" Whereas, concerning messengers he saith, "Who maketh winds his messengers, and flaming fire 'his ministers."' Campbell.—This construction indeed accords to the scope of the passage in the Psalms, as describing the different parts of the creation executing the Creator's mandates: yet the apostle's quotation requires us to explain the passage of the ministration of angels. The learned writer supposes the apostle's argument to rest, in part, on the difference between messenger, (ἀγγελος,) and Son: the former term being used even of inanimate beings; the latter appropriate to the divine Saviour.—The first and second quotations are exactly from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew. (2 Sam. 7:14. Ps. 2:7.) The third is nearly from the Septuagint, only changing the second person into the third; and putting "the angels of God" instead of "his angels:" and it varies from the Hebrew. (Ps. 97:7.)—The very words of the apostle occur in the Septuagint, (Deut. 32:41.) but there is nothing answering to them in the Hebrew. The last quotation is nearly from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew. (Ps. 104:4.)

V. 8, 9. A passage is next adduced from a most remarkable prophecy, in which JEHOVAH said to the Messiah, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever:" he addressed him as "God," declaring the perpetuity of his mediatorial kingdom to the end of the world, and over his redeemed people to all eternity. (Notes, Ps. 45:6,7. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) "The sceptre," with which he would rule his people, and the universe, for their benefit, was "a sceptre of righteousness;" even the exercise of his pardoning mercy would be most honourable to divine justice, and most effectual to promote righteousness in the world. (Note, 7:1—3.) His laws and administration would be altogether righteous; whilst he acted as the Friend and Saviour of sinners, he would most perfectly "love righteousness and hate iniquity." As "the Son of God," he was essentially and unchangeably holy; his human nature would be produced and preserved entirely free from all sin; his whole conduct, even unto death, would be perfectly righteous, and the government of his kingdom would be the same for ever. On this account "God, even his God" and Father, would anoint him, (for the future was spoken of, as if it had already taken place,) "with the oil of gladness," or the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, (the Source of all substantial gladness in the heart of man,) in a more abundant manner, than any of those prophets or servants of God had received, whom he owned as his "fellows," companions, or brethren in the human nature. The Holy "Spirit was given without measure" to Christ, for the benefit of his church, in consequence of his undertaking, incarnation, obedience to death, and exaltation to the mediatorial throne: from this "fulness all" his brethren "have received" their appointed measure; by which they have been qualified for their services, comforted under their trials, and prepared for their future happiness in heaven. (Notes, Is. 11:2—5. 42:1—4. 59: 20,21. 61:1—3. John 1:16. 3:27—36. 4:10—15. 7:25—36. Rev. 22:1.)—Some suppose, that angels were meant by Christ's fellows, because the apostle was proving his superiority to angels: but he never bore "the nature of angels; and partaking of the same nature seems to be the meaning of the expression. (Note, 2:16—18.) The quotation was full to the apostle's purpose, by proving that JEHOVAH spake of the Messiah in such language as he never used concerning angels: and the Psalmist, from whom he adduced his proof, spoke of the Messiah as incarnate, of his espousing the church to himself, and of believers as the companions of the glorious King. They were indeed "anointed with the oil of gladness," for his sake; but he far more than they all, even as his excellency and dignity exceeded theirs. (Notes, Ps. 45:)—"They who imagine this Psalm is an epithalamium upon Solomon's marrying Pharaoh's daughter, must suppose, that it is foretold ... that Solomon was to have a numerous progeny by her, whom he would set up for princes and rulers, up and down the world. (16) But this cannot be true: for beside that we read not of any children Solomon had by Pharaoh's daughter, ... Rehoboam, who succeeded him, was the son of Naamah, an Ammonitess. And so far was he from being able to set up his sons to rule over other countries, that it was with great difficulty his successors kept two tribes of the twelve steadfast to them.—Certainly, "a greater than Solomon was here."' Bp. Pierce.—Very many other suppositions, by which the prophecies concerning Christ, are explained away, or enervated, by men called Christians, might be shown to be equally absurd.—The quotation is nearly from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew.

V. 10—12. (Note, Ps. 102:25—28.) The Psalm, whence these verses are quoted, seems to be a prayer of the afflicted church of Israel, for the coming of her expected Deliverer: yet we might not have discovered, that the Son "of God" was personally addressed, had not the apostle led our attention to it in this view. But, considering it in connexion with other scriptures, and remembering that the ancient prophets continually spoke of their expected Messiah; as their great Deliverer from all enemies and troubles, we shall perceive a propriety in the church, under affliction, addressing herself to him, as her unchangeable Friend. He had "in the beginning created the heavens and the earth;" these would at length "wax old and wear out as a garment," but he would still remain possessed of infinite power and perfection. At the appointed period, therefore, he would "lay them aside," with as much ease as a man "folds up a garment," or changes it for another; and so introduce "new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness:" and still He would continue "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." (Notes, 13:7,8. Matt. 24:32—35, v. 35. 2 *Pet.*3:5—7,10—13. Rev. 1:8. 20:11. —15. 21:1—8.)—Probably, the Hebrews in general were prepared to understand this psalm, as well as the others of the Messiah: it is, however, to us a most explicit testimony to the Deity of Christ, as One with the Father, the Creator of all things.

Thou, Lord, &c. (10) The quotation is taken from the Septuagint, which exactly accords to the Hebrew: except that the word, rendered in our version, "change," is translated by ελιξεις, fold up; but the Alexandrian copy of the Septuagint, and some copies of the New Testament, read αλλαξεις, change.

V. 13, 14. JEHOVAH had never spoken to any angel in such language as was contained in another acknowledged prophecy of the Messiah; in which he called him to sit, as a mighty Prince, on his right hand, till he had crushed and put under his feet all those who presumed to rebel against his authority. (Notes, Ps. 110:1. Matt. 22:41—46. Acts 2:33—36. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) Did not the Hebrews well know, that "all angels," even the most exalted of them, were so far from possessing such supreme and universal authority, that they all were attendant spirits, and servants of the Lord, to execute his commands with unreserved submission; (Notes, Ps. 103:20—22. Is. 6:1—4. Rev. 5:11—14.) and that they were sent forth by him, to "minister" to those of the human race who were appointed to be "the heirs of salvation?" (Marg. Ref. x—z. Note, Luke 16:22,23. P. O. 19—26.) Their willing and delightful obedience to these commands, and their loving services to inferior and sinful creatures, for the Lord's sake, showed a most excellent disposition, and was worthy of imitation; yet no homage or worship were due to them on that account: on the contrary they were joint worshippers of JEHOVAH, whom they adored, in the person of Christ, the incarnate Son of God, and the Saviour of sinful men. As therefore such things were spoken of the Messiah, immensely beyond all which had been said of angels, in the sacred Scriptures: it was unreasonable to expect a mere man, or a temporal kingdom; or to suppose this glorious Lord would come to confirm and continue that dispensation, which had been given "by the ministration of angels."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. We can never sufficiently bless our God, that he has, in so many ways, and with such increasing clearness, spoken concerning salvation to us wretched sinners; and especially that he has sent the message of mercy to us, by his "well-beloved Son," whose dignity gives peculiar authority to every appointment, and certainty to every truth and promise. That "the First-begotten" of the Father, "the Heir of all things," by whom all worlds were created, and "by the word of whose power all things are upheld;" who is "the Effulgency of the divine glory," and the manifestation of the divine perfections; should "by himself purge our sins," is a mystery of love, which exceeds and overwhelms all our admiration, praise, and gratitude. Now, "having sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high;" "angels, principalities, and powers, are subject to him," who "inheriteth a far more excellent name than they." Let us not then perversely and ungratefully refuse him our adorations, whilst "all the angels of God worship him." For our salvation he abased himself, that he might "redeem us to God with his blood;" and shall we, on that account, refuse to adore and "honour him, even as we honour the Father that sent him?"

V. 5—14. We should never forget, that all the enemies of Christ will at length be put under his feet; and that all, "who will not have him to reign over them," are his enemies. (Note, Luke 19:11—27, v. 27.) Let us then seek mercy of our God, in that way which glorifies his justice also: let us bow to the sceptre of our Redeemer's grace; put our souls under his protection; and seek that renewal of our hearts, which will make us delight in obeying his holy commands, and render us like him in "loving righteousness and hating iniquity." In proportion as we are anointed with "the oil of gladness" from his fulness, and as members of his mystical body, this will be our character: and "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." We cannot indeed serve him as angels do, "who excel in strength," and are like a vehement wind, or the swift lightning, in executing his mandates: but we may copy their love, their alacrity and humility, in ministering at his word, to the poorest of "the heirs of salvation," who are by this ministry of angels more royally attended than the mightiest of ungodly men. Surely then we should deem none of our brethren, nor any of their concerns, beneath us; but, like these pure spirits, should count it our honour to do them good for Christ's sake. (Note, John 13:12—17. P. O. 8—17.) Such humiliation and self-abasement will make way for our exaltation to be "equal with the angels," yea, to "sit down with Christ upon his throne:" when he, who at first created the world, shall, with unchangeable power, destroy it as a worn out garment, and "make all things new:" and when all they, whose hearts and hopes were placed on its perishing treasures and fading glories, will be driven from his presence into everlasting misery.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—4. The apostle, in the midst of his argument, paused, as it were, after the proof of Christ's pre-eminent dignity, to make some application of his doctrine. The Hebrews, and all to whom the gospel came, "ought to give the more earnest," believing, and obedient attention to what they had heard; because of the majesty of the Speaker, and the gracious nature of his words. (Notes, Matt. 17:5—8. Acts 3:22—33.) It was incumbent on those also, who professed Christianity, to apply their minds with increasing reverence to these important subjects; lest at any time, through temptation, worldly cares and pleasures, or persecution, they should be induced to "let them slip," or run out as water from a leaky vessel. This aptly represents the treachery of the memory, respecting spiritual things; and the way in which good instructions, convictions, or affections gradually vanish, and no abiding change is made, or effect produced by them.—The Jews counted the authority of the law to be great, and its perpetuity indubitable, because it was spoken by angels, as employed by JEHOVAH in delivering it to their fathers from mount Sinai. (Notes, Ex. 19:16—20. Deut. 33:2. Acts 7:51—53. Gal. 3:19—22.) But "if the word spoken by ministering spirits was steadfast," so that JEHOVAH would not permit any of the people to transgress in any way, without inflicting on them merited punishment; (Marg. Ref. e.) how "could they escape" his vengeance, if they neglected "so great salvation" as that of the gospel? The greatness of the Saviour, who "created and upholds all things;" the immensity of the price paid by him for man's salvation; the depth of the misery from which he saves his people, and their perishing need of this salvation, its entire freeness to the chief of sinners who seek for it, without limitation or exception; the infinite provision made for the supply of all their wants; and the glorious felicity in which it terminates: all these things, and far more, unite in rendering it worthy to be called "so great salvation," even so great a salvation that it surpasses all conception. To refuse this invaluable blessing, from pride, love of the world and sin, or attachment to superstitious vanities; to neglect it, through sloth, procrastination, an aversion to the means of grace, or a fear of persecution; and to oppose or corrupt it, from enmity to God and holiness, not only leave men under "the curse of the law," but incur the condemnation of treating the truth of God as a lie, of despising his mercy, defying his justice and power, and rejecting his most gracious and urgent overtures to reconciliation. (Notes, John 3:19—21. 1 John 5:9,10.) How then can such persons escape the wrath to come?—This salvation first began to be published, in the fullest display of it, under the gospel dispensation, by the Lord himself, appearing in human nature, as the great Prophet of the church. He deigned to be the Preacher of this great salvation: and after his ascension into heaven "to appear in the presence of God for us," it was confirmed to the Jews and others, by his apostles and evangelists, who had been eyewitnesses of his glory, had heard his doctrine, and received their commission immediately from him. Moreover, God himself bore witness to their doctrine, as that of his beloved Son, by various miraculous powers exercised by them, and conferred on others also; and by the gifts of his Holy Spirit, dispensed to them according to his own sovereign will. (Notes, Mark 16:17—20. John 15:26,27. 20:24—29.) so that the condescension of "the Son of God," in becoming incarnate, and in first publishing his doctrine by his own personal ministry; his exaltation, and the subsequent sending of his ambassadors, with such divinely attested credentials, to preach salvation to sinners, concurred in calling the attention of the Jews from the abrogated Mosaic dispensation to Christianity.

V. 5—9. The argument concerning the Messiah's superiority to the angels, is here resumed. "The world to come," is supposed to have been a phrase in use among the Jews, denoting the times of the Messiah. This period began at the first coming of Christ, and will continue till his second coming. The words, however, do not occur elsewhere: and some think, that the apostle alludes to the words of the prophet, concerning "new heavens and a new earth." (Note, Is. 65:17—19.) This includes the dispensation of the Messiah and the millennium, as connected with heavenly happiness. These are not subjected to angels, but to him whom all the angels worship and obey; nor were they ministerially employed in the introduction of it, as they had been in the giving of the law, and in many things relating to Israel's settlement in Canaan: but the Captain of Salvation exclusively and openly. (Note, 10—13.)—This had been implied in what was "spoken by one in a certain place," with which the Hebrews were well acquainted. In a view of the starry heavens, those majestic displays of God's creating power, David had exclaimed, "What is man," &c. (Note, Ps. 8: 4—9.)—The words might indeed be explained of the attention and kindness of God to so inconsiderable a creature as man, amidst the immensity of his works. He had made him at first in some degree inferior to the angels, but he "had crowned him with glory and honour," and made him lord of this lower creation. Yet, as man had soon fallen from his original dignity, had lost his crown of honour, and retained but an imperfect dominion over the creatures; (Note, Gen. 1:26,27. 3:) and as the Messiah was intended to be the chief Glory and blessing of the fallen race: the Psalmist might properly be considered, as "in Spirit" speaking of him; and of JEHOVAH's being mindful of the human race, and visiting them, by giving his own Son to become the Son of man for their salvation. Indeed, if the words were exactly weighed, it would be found, that they had not received a full accomplishment in any other sense: for if God "put all things in subjection under the feet" of the Son of man, it must follow that there was nothing left "which was not put in subjection under him;" whereas it was manifest, that all things, even here on earth, (not to speak of other worlds,) were not thus put in subjection to man; for many of the creatures scorned to bear his yoke, and some even made war against him. But believers, "looking to Jesus," saw the accomplishment in his exaltation, and in the glorious and blessed event of it: he had become "a little lower than the angels," by appearing "in the likeness of sinful flesh," that he might be capable of suffering death; but speedily he had been, as the Son of man, "crowned with glory and honour," placed on the mediatorial throne, invested with universal dominion, and "made Head over all things to his church." So that, in fact, "all things in heaven and earth, and under the earth," were put in subjection to him; and, though some for a time refused to submit to him, they must all at length, either be his willing servants, or be crushed under his feet as enemies. (Notes, 1:13,14. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) Thus, by means of his humiliation, he became capable of dying; and, by his subsequent exaltation, he was enabled to apply the benefits of his death to his people; and so "he tasted death" for the benefit of every man who should come to trust in his salvation. This constitution was the effect of the plenteous mercy and free favour of God to our rebellious race, as the Psalmist had intimated: nor could that grace ever be sufficiently admired.—A little lower. (9) Many expositors suppose the original to mean, "lower for a short time;" that is, during the term of our Lord's humiliation on earth: but the use of the same word in the seventh verse, determines its sense here; and there it can have no reference to time, unless we explain the Psalm as a prophecy of Christ exclusively, without allowing that either Adam or his posterity were at all intended. It is indeed argued, that Jesus was made, in human nature, immensely lower than the angels, being "despised and rejected of men," and considered as one of the most abject of the human race. This objection, however, seems to be of no validity; for his real dignity and excellency as man, and not the opinion of others concerning him, are meant. He was, in human nature, as the "first Adam" had been, "a little lower than the angels:" and, being made like us in all things, sin alone excepted, he became capable of suffering and death, from which angels are exempted. In these respects he was "made a little lower than the angels;" but in all other things, he, even as Man in his lowest humiliation, was little lower than they, being immensely superior to all others of the human race, not excepting Adam himself before the fall.—Taste death.] Some explain these words as signifying the pain which our Lord endured in dying; and others, as marking the short time during which he continued dead: but the expression seems to have been in use among the Jews, as merely denoting to die. (Marg. Ref. a.)—The quotation is from the Septuagint: but that entirely corresponds with the Hebrew; except as it translates Elohim, (often rendered Gods,) by the word "angels;" as it does in many other places: and the word God is substituted in the translation of the last quotation, for JEHOVAH in the Hebrew.

V. 10—13. Whatever the Jews might object to the sufferings and crucifixion of him who was preached to them as the Messiah; yet it certainly "became" the eternal God, for whose glory, and by whose power, all things were created, and are upheld and governed, to adopt this method. It had not only pleased him as a Sovereign to do this: but it was admirably suited to manifest the glory of all his perfections; yea, it was necessary for the harmonious display of them. Having therefore purposed to predestinate to the adoption of children an innumerable company of Adam's fallen race; (Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) he was pleased, in his infinite wisdom and love, to appoint them "a Captain," who should call them forth out of their state of sin and misery, and lead them through life and death, to his eternal glory: for the word, rendered "in bringing," agrees with that translated "Captain." It was proper, that this Captain, Prince, or Commander, who leads an innumerable multitude of fallen sinners, as the "children of God," to victory over Satan, sin, the world, and death, and to eternal "glory,"—that this Author of their salvation should be "made perfect through sufferings;" that is, perfectly authorized, as well as qualified, for every part of that most important work. (Note, 5:7—10.) For, by assuming human nature, and "humbling himself to the death upon the cross" for our sins, he made the salvation of sinners consistent with divine justice, and showed us the way of "fighting the good fight of faith," and pressing forward to the conqueror's crown. Thus Jesus, who "sanctifieth," or purifies his people from guilt and sin, and consecrates them to God; and they who are thus sanctified by him, "are all of one," that is, of one father Adam; or, as speaking to the Jews, the apostle might mean Abraham. He became One with us in human nature; in order that his sufferings might atone for our sins, and that we might be justified by his righteousness: for which cause, he is "not ashamed to own us as his brethren," notwithstanding his glorious majesty and perfect holiness, and our meanness, guilt, and pollution. Thus, in a remarkable prophecy of his sufferings, and subsequent glory, he had been introduced as saying, "I will declare thy name unto my brethren," and as engaging to celebrate the praises of JEHOVAH in his church of redeemed sinners. (Note, Ps. 22:22.) In another place, where the Messiah's deliverances, victories, and kingdom were predicted under the type of David; he spake as Man, of "trusting in the LORD" amidst his trials, even as his brethren did. (Marg. Ref. p.) And by another prophet, he had said, "Behold I, and the children which God hath given me;" (Note, Is. 8:18.) which implied the same equality of nature and endeared affection, as the relation of brethren. Many things, in the eighth of Isaiah, are evidently prophetical of the Messiah, and as such are quoted repeatedly in the New Testament; (Notes, Is. 8:) and, no doubt, the text here adduced was understood of him by the learned Jews. For the apostle was well acquainted with their sentiments; and would not have quoted it, in a sense different from the usual interpretation, in an argumentative discourse, without attempting to establish the new interpretation by cogent reasonings. (Note, 1:5—7.)—The quotations are all from the Septuagint, which does not materially vary from the Hebrew.

V. 14, 15. As therefore "the children," of whom Christ spake by the prophet, even his elect people whom he had undertaken to redeem, "were partakers of flesh and blood,"

16 For [d]verily he [e]took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him [f]the seed of Abraham.

17 Wherefore in all things [g]it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren; that he might be [h]a merciful and faithful High-Priest in things pertaining to God, [i]to make reconciliation for the sins of the people.

or of human nature; he also voluntarily condescended "to partake of the same," in order that he might stand in the nearest relation to them, and so most properly become their Surety and Representative; and also be made capable of suffering and dying for them: that by so doing he might, as to them, "abolish" the reign of death, by destroying the dominion of the devil "who hath the power of death." For Satan, by seducing man into sin, first brought him under the sentence of death: every man must be exposed to the sting, the terror, the stroke, and the tremendous consequences of death, while he continues unpardoned and unconverted; and the devil, as accuser and executioner, may have much power in inflicting or aggravating these things. But the redemption of Christ made way for the deliverance of his people from Satan's bondage, and for the pardon of their sins through faith. Then the devil loses his power in respect of death also; they are delivered from its sting, its terror, and its dreadful consequences; whilst inward peace and hope reconcile them to its stroke, and the whole will terminate in their glorious resurrection to eternal life.. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:55—58.) Thus Christ "delivered those, who all their lifetime had been subject to bondage through fear of death." Whatever pride, ambition, and desperate passions, united with unbelief, may sometimes effect or perpetrate; the fear of death is universal, and in some degree enslaves all mankind: the juster apprehensions men have of God and eternal things, the greater must be their dread of death, and its awful consequences; except as faith in Christ deliver them. Many of those, who have been enslaved by it, during the former part of their lives, or at least from the time when they began seriously to reflect on the subject, are actually delivered from their terror by the gospel, and habitually think of dying with great composure and satisfaction. Many, who do not before rise superior to their terrors, are entirely freed from them at that critical season; and even those believers, who fear death to the last, (as some perhaps do,) will be the more amazed at their deliverance; when, by the stroke which they dreaded all their lifetime, they find themselves perfectly freed from all which they groaned under and hated; and admitted to a felicity exceeding their largest expectations.—Through death. (15) 'Had not this been added, the apostle might have seemed to speak very absurdly: for must God become Man, in order to conquer the devil? Assuredly, here was need rather of strength than weakness. The apostle therefore declares, that to render this victory the most glorious, it was peculiarly suitable, that Satan, the conqueror of man, should be laid prostrate by a Man; and so, by the very death of a Man, he might be destroyed, as by his own weapons.—The devil is said to have "the power of death," as from him sprang, which death followed; and as he daily tempts us to sin, that he may draw us with himself into the ruin of eternal death.—Understand death, as joined with the wrath of God, which without Christ it must necessarily be: nor can any thing be conceived more miserable than to be under the perpetual slavery of this dread and horror.' Beza.

V. 16—18. The introductory words of this passage are differently interpreted. Our translation explains them of our Lord's assuming, not "the nature of angels," but our nature, in order to be our Brother, Surety, and Saviour; and the mention of the seed of Abraham, from whom he descended, favours this interpretation: but the margin, and indeed a great majority of commentators, suppose the apostle to mean, that the eternal Son of God, when angels sinned, did not "take hold" of them, to preserve them from final perdition; but he "took hold" of fallen man, to rescue him from this dreadful doom; and this indeed lays the firmer foundation for the subsequent inference. "The seed of Abraham," however, on this interpretation, cannot mean all the natural descendants of Abraham, nor any of them exclusively; but must be understood of Abraham's believing seed, whether Jews or Gentiles; and this, though it accords to the apostle's manner in other places, (Rom. 4:11—25. Gal. 3:26—29.) is not thought a natural exposition in his present argument.—The difference, indeed, is not great, between the two interpretations. In "laying hold" of fallen man, and not on fallen angels, the Son of God did not assume the nature of the former into personal union with his Deity; but, by a condescension still more inconceivable, he assumed human nature of "the seed of Abraham:" and this was worthy of peculiar attention; for it thus appeared, that "it behooved him," and he must, in order to the honourable salvation of sinners, whom he graciously owned as brethren, "be made like" them in the same nature, and in all those infirmities to which sin had subjected them, as far as he could be without defilement. This was needful, in order that he might become their High-Priest, making atonement and reconciliation for their sins, by "the sacrifice of himself," and so lay the foundation for his subsequent intercession for them; and that he might give them the firmest ground of assurance concerning his compassion, love, and faithfulness. (Note, Rom. 5:6—11.) For thus he, who was One with the Father as God, became One with them as Man; and so assured them that he would attend to the interests of his brethren, in the most condescending, merciful, and faithful manner; even as he would regard the glory of God the Father, before whom he acted as their High-Priest. And by this voluntary humiliation, and these sufferings for them when enemies, he gave the most endearing pledge of his love to them, and taught them most emphatically, that he would not fail them, when they were brought to trust in him; and when his omnipotent arm could affect the purpose, for which he had shed his precious blood. For, "in that he suffered, being tempted" by Satan in the wilderness, and during his last conflicts; (whose unholy suggestions must have tortured his mind, in proportion as he abhorred, and could not be defiled by them;) in that he endured the severest trials from man's contemptuous malice and cruelty; and in that he bore the wrath of the Father for our sins: "he was able to succour" such as were tempted, or tried, and afflicted by God: being authorized, as Mediator, to exert omnipotence in supporting, comforting, and rescuing them: and having a sympathizing, and most tender love for them; seeing he had passed through the same temptations himself, as far as he could do it, continuing perfectly free from sin.—The ends of Christ's humiliation, death, and exaltation, are set forth in this chapter.—To "taste death for every man," to "become the Captain of our salvation," and to "lead us to glory," to "sanctify us" to "destroy death, and him that had the power of death," to deliver us from the bondage of the devil, and the fear of death, to become our "High-Priest, to make reconciliation for our iniquity," having "by himself purged our sins." (1:3.) What unutterable blessings are these, flowing to us from "the grace of God, in Christ our Lord!" and what do they imply concerning the natural state of fallen man!

It behooved him. (17) Ὤφειλε. He ought, or owed, as having undertaken to be our Surety. (Note, Philem. 17—21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. The pre-eminent excellency, importance, and clearness of the gospel, and the dignity and grace of the Redeemer, concur in calling on us to "give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard:" for unless serious recollection, fervent prayer, and reverent attention, with subsequent meditation and practice, prevent; we shall surely let divine truths run out of our minds, as water from a vessel with holes. Alas! how many hearers of this kind are found in all our congregations! Indeed we are all in some measure criminal and foolish in this respect. Let us then beg of God to sanctify our memories and hearts, that we may become less forgetful, and more practical hearers of "the word of life."—The judgments of God, under the new dispensation, are chiefly spiritual; but they are on that account the more to be dreaded; and "if they who despised Moses' law died without mercy;" "how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation," as that which Christ has wrought for us, and revealed in his gospel? Blessed be God, this salvation is so great and perfect, that nothing, except our neglect of it, in one way or another, can exclude us from its eternal advantages; so that the trembling penitent, who is ready to think himself too criminal to be pardoned, or too polluted to be cleansed, may come to Christ with cheerful confidence, and expect from him the free gift of all which can be needful for him: and even those who are conscious of having hitherto "neglected so great salvation," may hope for the pardon of that atrocious guilt in the same manner; being assured, that "where sin hath abounded, grace shall much more abound."—Yet even partial neglects will not escape rebukes: and they, whose souls are not finally ruined, often weaken their evidence, and bring darkness upon their minds, by them. Let us then mind this "one thing needful:" for, though we cannot sit at the Lord's feet, and hear instruction from his gracious lips, as they do, to whom he first began to speak the word; yet in duly attending to the writings which were left by those who thus heard him, and which have been abundantly attested to us by God himself, we shall be equally blessed with "that good part which cannot be taken from us." (Notes, Luke 10:38—42 John 20:24—29.

V. 5—13. The glorious God has done wonderful things for us, in creation and providence, for which, alas! we have made the basest returns: but he was "mindful of us, and visited us," in the most surprising manner, when he gave his own Son, to be "made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death," in our nature and for our salvation: that, being "crowned with glory and honour," and having all "power given to him in heaven and earth;" he might rescue every man, who believes in him, from all the effects of original and actual sin, and raise him to far higher dignity, than what was lost by Adam's transgression. (Notes, Rom. 5:12—19. 8:32—34. 1 John 4:9—12.) By the grace manifested in the incarnation of the Son of God, and the exaltation of the Son of man, the honour of our nature is eternally secured; and all our concern should be, to secure an interest in this salvation. Whatever the proud, carnal, and unbelieving may imagine or object; the spiritual mind will perceive peculiar glory in the cross of Christ; and be satisfied, that "it became him," (who in all things makes the manifestation of the glory of his own perfections his chief end,) "in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Author of their salvation perfect through sufferings." Wisdom, power, justice, holiness, truth, and love, beyond expression or conception, are displayed by our God, in that union which was voluntarily formed between "him that sanctifieth, and them who are sanctified," when "the Word was made flesh, and tabernacled among us;" and when he "whom all angels worship," vouchsafed to become our Brother, and to own and glory in that condescending relation to us sinful worms. And what advantages may we not expect from so powerful and gracious a Friend and Brother? (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. John 15:12—16.)

V. 14—18. When the divine Saviour saw "the children," whom he had undertaken to redeem, "partakers of flesh and blood:" he also was pleased to "take part of the same;" though he knew, that he must not only dwell in their nature, but bear their curse, pay their ransom, and, through death, deliver them from the old serpent, by whom sin and death entered into the world, to make havoc of the human race.—(Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Gal. 3:6—14. Phil. 2:5—11. 1 John 3:7—10.) For "verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took upon him the seed of Abraham;" that we might be made the children of Abraham, and the friends of God through him! (Notes, Gal. 3:26—29. Jam. 2:21—24.) Let then sinners, who dread death, and use a variety of methods to banish their terrors, no longer attempt to outbrave or repress them; let them not grow outrageous or licentious, through despair; nor let them expect help from the world or human inventions: but let them seek pardon, and peace, and grace, and lively hope of heaven, by faith in him who died and rose again; that, being rescued from Satan's power, they may be made superior to the fear of death, which has always hitherto held them in bondage. (Notes, Col. 1:9—14.) Let the trembling believer frequently meditate on the love of Christ, and on his cross, his sepulchre, his resurrection, and his glory; and thus, in simple dependence and obedience, let him wait for more complete deliverance "from the fear of death," and from that last enemy himself, in the Lord's appointed time.—Let us all remember, that so deep was our ruin, and so heinous our guilt, that "it behooved Jesus to become in all things like unto us, that so he might be our faithful and merciful High-Priest, in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of his people;" that we may come to the Father only in his name, and pleading his atonement and intercession, not in the least doubting of his faithfulness and mercy towards all "who come to God by him." And let the afflicted and tempted, instead of yielding to despondency, or giving place to the devil, (as if their harassing temptations rendered it improper for them to come to the Lord with their prayers,) remember that the Saviour "suffered being tempted," in order that he might be "able to succour them that are tempted," that he has infinite power and compassion; and that he only waits to be called in to their help, by fervent persevering prayer. May we then hear him declare to us the name of God, and teach us to celebrate his praises; and may we learn to pass through all trials and temptations, "trusting in the LORD, and staying ourselves upon our God;" that we may at length be found among those whom the incarnate Saviour will present before the Father's throne, saying, "Behold I, and the children whom thou hast given me!" (Note, Matt. 25:34—40.)

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—6. From what had been advanced and proved, concerning the superiority of the Messiah to the angels, and his dignity as the incarnate Son of God; the apostle next took occasion to call the attention of the Hebrews to the offices which he performed for the benefit of his church. He addressed them as "holy brethren;" either as belonging to that nation, which was relatively holy, or rather as professed Christians; and "partakers of the heavenly calling," by which the Lord from heaven called them to leave the vain pursuit of earthly things, and to "seek those things which are above." (Notes, Phil. 3:12—14. Col. 3:1—4.) He exhorted them to consider, and attend impartially and seriously to his words respecting Jesus the Messiah, as "the Apostle and High-Priest of their profession." He had been sent by the Father as his apostle, even as he had sent others to be his apostles, or messengers from him to mankind. (Note, John 20:19—23.) In this respect, he more especially superseded Moses in his prophetical office, as the lawgiver of Israel; even as, in his high-priesthood, he superseded Aaron and his posterity. Of this latter office the sacred writer meant afterwards to discourse more fully: he therefore proceeded to show how superior Christ was to Moses, as it might be proved from the prophecies of his being "the Son of God." He had been "faithful" to the Father, who had appointed him to this office; and had revealed to mankind the perfections, truths, and will of God, in the most perfect manner. Indeed, Moses had been faithful to his trust, in delivering to Israel all the commandments and statutes which God gave to him; and in ruling over the church, which might be called "his house," or the holy habitation of JEHOVAH.—(Num. 12:7.) Yet Christ must be considered as immensely superior to Moses; "for he was counted worthy," by the Father, "of more glory" and honour, than Moses could be entitled to; even as the builder of a house is more honourable than the building, or any part of it. Thus Moses had been only a part of "the house of God," or a member of his household; but Christ had created him, and the whole nation; he had formed them into a church, had arranged every thing with supreme authority, respecting their civil and religious constitution; and had given all believers among them spiritual life, grace, wisdom, and ability: so that he was, as God, the Former, Owner, and Head of the church, even before his incarnation; though in a different manner than afterwards. (Note, Phil. 2:5—8.) For as "every house" is contrived, erected, furnished, and prepared for a habitation, by some person, whose skill and intelligence are visible in it: so "He, who built all things" as Creator, and arranged all things in the church of Israel, could be no other than God himself. This honour the Messiah possessed; (Note, Acts 7:37—43.) and this glorious Person had at length appeared in human nature, as the Apostle, or Prophet, of the Father, to introduce a new dispensation, and terminate the old one. In still plainer language, Moses had been "faithful, as a servant, in the house" of the Lord, to introduce the legal dispensation, which prefigured and bore witness to those things that were to be more clearly revealed in future times: but Christ was faithful "as a Son," possessing authority "over his own house." For the church belonged to him, as it did unto the Father; though he voluntarily acted as the Prophet of the Father to mankind. This spiritual house consisted of those who had been given to him and redeemed by him; and who were called by his grace, and "made a habitation of God through the Spirit;" so that the apostle, and the Hebrews professing the gospel, whom he immediately addressed, were a part of that sacred temple, in which God would delight to dwell, to manifest his presence, and to communicate his blessings for ever. (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) This would be their felicity, if they "held fast their confidence" in Christ, their "hope" of salvation by him, and their "joy" and glorying in him; and were firm and steadfast in dependence on him, and obedience to him, amidst the various temptations and persecutions, to which this would expose them; as this perseverance would be the proper evidence of their sincerity. (Notes, 14—19. 10:35—39. Rom. 5:3—5.)—'The government of the Christian church is entirely committed to the Lord Jesus; and he, as supreme Head and Lord of all, ... governs both it, and all things in earth and heaven, for the good of it: and, therefore, if he be not truly God, God doth not now govern the world, ... but hath given up the administration of it to a creature.' Whitby.—The words translated "made all things," may rather relate to the formation of the church, than to the creation of the world: yet there can be no reasonable doubt, that the apostle pur-

7 ¶ Wherefore, [t]as the Holy Ghost saith, [u]To-day if ye will [x]hear his voice,

8 [y]Harden not your hearts, [z]as in the provocation, in the day of [a]temptation in the wilderness;

9 When your fathers tempted me, proved me, [b]and saw my works [c]forty years.

10 Wherefore, [d]I was grieved with that generation, and said, They do alway [e]err in their heart, and [f]they have not known my ways.

11 So [g]I sware in my wrath, [*]They shall not enter into [h]my rest.

12 [i]Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you [k]an evil heart of unbelief, [l]in departing from [m]the living God.

13 But [n]exhort one another [o]daily while it is called To-day, lest any of you be hardened through [p]the deceitfulness of sin.

14 For [q]we are made partakers of Christ, [r]if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end;

15 While it is said, [s]To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation.

16 For [t]some, when they had heard, did provoke: howbeit [u]not all that came out of Egypt by Moses.

17 But [x]with whom was he grieved forty years? [y]was it not with them that had sinned, [z]whose carcasses fell in the wilderness?

18 And [a]to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, [b]but to them that believed not?

19 So we see that [c]they could not enter in because of unbelief.

posely intimated, that he who formed the church also created the world: and certainly he asserted that Christ, whether as Former and Ruler of the church, or Creator of all things, is God.—Faithful. (2) Faithfulness to God who appoints, and tenderness to man by whom he is appointed, are the two great qualifications, laid down as a requisite in the High-Priest, here and elsewhere. (2:17. 4:15. 5:2—8.) He was made perfect, as to the latter, by his assumption of our nature, and his sufferings in it. His Deity, as One with the Father, secured the former.—He faithfully maintained the honour and rights of God, in every part of his salvation; he was faithful in the whole revelation, which he made to us of God and his will; and in performing whatever he was sent into the world to accomplish, for rendering the salvation of man consistent with the honour of God.

V. 7—13. This address was directed to those professed Christians, who were in danger of apostatizing, or who did not seem in earnest in their religion; but it was likewise peculiarly suited to excite the attention of such Jews also, as might read it. The example of their unbelieving progenitors, and the words of their own Scriptures respecting them, were adduced with great propriety, and power of conviction, on this occasion. (Notes, Ps. 95:7—11.)—The warning, given by the Holy Spirit in the days of David, with reference to more ancient events, was equally applicable to the Jews in the days of the apostle. On that very day, which might terminate their lives, or the season of the Lord's long-suffering, or deprive them of the means of grace, they were urgently entreated to attend to the voice of God in obedient faith, if they ever meant to obtain his favour and escape his wrath; and not obstinately to "harden their hearts," and stupify their consciences in wilful sin, or by carnal prejudices and pleasures. This their fathers had done, "in the provocation" of Jehovah, which had taken place, "in the wilderness;" when, after all the demonstrations of his power and goodness to them, they ungratefully wearied out his patience by their aggravated rebellions. That season was peculiarly "the day of temptation;" for their fathers acted as if they meant to try how much provocation God would bear, before he took vengeance upon them. (Notes, Ex. 17:1,2. Matt. 4:5—7.) Wherefore he was at length so angered and grieved by their perverse returns for his manifold favours, that he would no longer bear with that generation of Israel. For he said of them, "They do always err in their hearts:" their wicked hearts always led them to depart from him; as they had never approved and chosen his holy ways, but had always preferred their own evil devices. He therefore irrevocably determined, and confirmed it by an oath, that they should never enter into the rest of Canaan, the type of heavenly felicity. (Notes, Num. 14:20—45.) It therefore was incumbent upon the Hebrews, whom the writer addressed, to look well to themselves, lest there should be in any of them the same "evil" or wicked "heart," the same proud, carnal, rebellious, and ungrateful temper, whence the unbelief of their ancestors had originated; and lest this should be manifested by their "apostatizing from the living God;" either from the first rejecting Christianity, or afterwards renouncing it: for, in both cases, they would be deemed apostates from the living God, who now spoke to them by his beloved Son, and in no other way; and they would be punished accordingly, though they still professed to worship the God of their fathers. To prevent this, they ought also, day after day, "to exhort one another" to embrace and adhere to the gospel of Christ; while the time of their personal and national probation continued: (Notes, Luke 19:41—44. John 12:34—36.) as they would shortly cease to be the people of God; and that generation was about to be visited in a far more tremendous manner than their fathers had been in the wilderness. This was needful to them all, "lest any one of them should be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin:" for their sinful propensities tended to deceive them into a persuasion, that satisfaction and impunity might be found in the world and in disobedience: and that the self-denial and suffering, connected with Christianity, were unnecessary and intolerable. Thus they would delude them into negligence, procrastination, and self-indulgence; which, producing frequent violations of the light of their own consciences, would gradually render them callous; and God might thus be provoked to give them up to fatal delusions or final obduracy. (Notes, Ex. 4:21. 8:15. 2 Thes. 2:8—12.)—'Seeing Moses, the servant, could not be despised with impunity; let them consider what punishment they must endure, if they despised the Son of God, to whom Moses himself invites them.' Beza. (Notes, 10:26—31. 12:22—25.) The apostle's reasoning, like that of Stephen, (Notes, Acts 7:37—53.) was suited to show, that the fathers of the Jewish nation had, in every age, been prone to "resist the Holy Spirit," and those who spake by him. This had excluded the generation which came out of Egypt from Canaan, in the days of Moses: David, many ages after, was inspired by the Holy Spirit, to warn the Israelites against imitating their unbelieving progenitors, and forfeiting spiritual blessings; and the writer of the epistle warns his contemporaries, not to exclude themselves from heaven, in the same manner as their ancestors were excluded from Canaan. In this view, there is a vast energy in the warning and exhortation.—As the Holy Ghost saith. (7) How decidedly this attests the book of Psalms to be the word of God; and not merely of David, or any other man? (Notes, 2 Sam. 23:1,2. Mark 12:35—37. The quotation is almost verbatim from the Septuagint, which well translates the Hebrew. (Ps. 95:7—11.)

Provocation. (8) Παραπικρασμῳ. 15. Παρεπικραναν, 16. Neither word is used elsewhere. Excessive irritation, or bitterness of spirit, is implied.—Err. (10) Πλανωνται. Matt. 24:4. John 7:47. 2 Tim. 3:13. Tit. 3:3. Jam. 16. 1 John 1:8. 3:7. Are deceived, or deceive themselves.—Evil heart. (12) Καρδια πονηρα. Matt. 12:34,35. Mark 7:22,23. Luke 8:15. (Note, John 3:19—21.)

V. 14—19. Those who professed the gospel were "made partakers of Christ," and of all the blessings of his kingdom and salvation; provided they maintained "the beginning of their confidence," (or their subsistence in him by faith,) "steadfast unto the end;" and thus showed that they really were what they appeared to be. (Notes, Col. 1:21—23. 1 John 1:3,4.) Considering, therefore, the immense advantages of perseverance, and the tremendous consequences of apostacy; they should consider the words of the Holy Spirit as addressed immediately to themselves. For, though the whole nation of Israel had been brought out of Egypt, to hear the will of God from Moses; yet some of them (how vast a proportion it was not necessary to state) provoked God to exclude them from Canaan. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10:1—10. Jude 5—8.) There were however some exceptions, even in that devoted generation; as Joshua and Caleb, and some of the Levites, and of the women: (Note, Num. 14:27—30.) and thus, in the apostle's time, a remnant of Jews believed in Christ, whilst the bulk of the nation were about to perish in unbelief. (Note, Rom. 11:1—6.) Yet God had not failed of performing his promises, when he excluded that generation from Canaan; neither was this inconsistent with his justice: for "with whom was he grieved," but with those obstinate transgressors who always rebelled against him? He therefore cut them off, and their dead bodies lay by heaps in the wilderness; while his promises were performed to the remnant of believers, and to the children of the rebels, as they would also be in the present case. (Notes, Ps. 90: title. 7—17.) In that particular instance, when "he sware in his wrath, that they should not enter into his rest;" the tremendous sentence included none but the unbelievers: so that they could not enter into Canaan "because of their unbelief:" nor could the Hebrews, whom the writer addressed, by any possible means enter heaven, unless they believed in Jesus Christ.—While it is said, &c. (15) 'This sentence is noble; from which we learn, that the words of the prophets did not pertain to that one time; but that God, even at this day, invites us to himself, by setting the writings of the prophets before us.' Beza. This is directly opposite to the conduct of many modern expositors and theologians, who labour strenuously to prove, that the language of the sacred writers, in many places, was intended for certain descriptions of persons in their own time; and is but little, if at all applicable to us, who are placed in very different circumstances. But, in reality, it is of comparatively small importance to us, as to religion, what the meaning of any passage in Scripture may be; if we are not concerned in it, and can, in our situation, derive no instruction, encouragement, or warning from it: and the grand use of both exposition and preaching, is to show how we may apply each part of Scripture warrantably to our own cases, according to the circumstances in which we are placed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. All who hear and profess the gospel should be "holy brethren:" and all who are "partakers of the heavenly calling," will be sanctified, and united in love, according to their measure of faith. This "calling is from heaven," and brings men thither: yet we all need to be excited to "consider" more frequently and attentively the condescending "Apostle" and compassionate "High-Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus:" and every renewed contemplation of his Person and his salvation will suggest new instructions, or new motives to love, confidence, and obedience.—The stewards and servants of God are required to be faithful in all things intrusted to them, and many have been approved as such by their common Lord. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:1,2. 1 Tim. 1:12—14.) But the eternal Son of God is "counted worthy of more honour," than any or all of his servants: they are only a part of the spiritual house, of which he is the great Builder, Proprietor, and Ruler: and his new creation of the church as really proclaims "his eternal power and Godhead," as his formation and upholding of the universe. As therefore they are most absurd, who allow "every house to be builded of some man," and yet atheistically ascribe the glorious creation around them to chance or necessity; so they reason little, if at all better, who allow "Christ to be the Author of life, holiness, wisdom, strength, and salvation, to the multitudes of his people, and yet deny his real Deity.—All prophets and apostles acted as servants "in the house" of another, to bear testimony to Christ, and to honour him; but he appeared to direct and govern all things, with unlimited sovereignty, as "a Son over his own house." May we then belong to this spiritual building; and manifest that we do so, by "holding fast our confidence, and the rejoicing of our hope" in Christ, steadfast, through all trials, even to the end! (Notes, Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.)

V. 7—19. Alas! what numbers of professed Christians are as far from the power of true religion, as the Israelites were in the days of Moses, or the Jews in those of St. Paul! The Holy Spirit therefore still says to them: "To-day if ye will hear the voice of God," and "submit to his righteousness, and authority, do not harden your hearts."—While sinners are procrastinating, God may be about to say, "This night shall your souls be required of you." *(*Notes. Luke 12:15—21. 13:22—30.) How infatuated then must they be, to close their eyes and harden their hearts against conviction, to run into dissipation and worldly lusts, to yield to sloth, and to make delays, in such a perilous situation! (Note, Prov. 6:1—5.) Thus, like the ancient rebels in Israel, vast numbers provoke and tempt God, till, being grieved by their obstinacy, and their carnal enmity to him and his ways, "he swears in his wrath that they shall never enter into his rest.' Let then such triflers and loiterers, on the brink of the bottomless pit, look well to themselves; for evil is before them. Let them remember that their unbelief springs from the wickedness of their hearts: for they must be conscious that their excuses, their delays, and even their objections to doctrines and preachers, arise from covetousness or sensuality; from pride, the love of the world, and an aversion to the life of faith and holiness.—We all, however, have need to exhort one another daily, or while the day of life and grace continues, lest sin should first deceive, and then harden us; till negligences and offences, in lighter things, terminate in more daring crimes, or open apostacy.—The happiness of being "partakers of Christ," as our complete Salvation and eternal Portion, and the fear of God's wrath and eternal misery, combine to put us upon our guard against hypocrisy and apostacy, and to excite us to persevere in the life of obedient faith. Let us then beware of trusting to outward privileges or profession; remembering that unbelief and disobedience will exclude men from God's promised rest, and that nothing else can do it: and let us pray to be numbered with that remnant of believers, who will enter heaven, when all others shall be refused admission "because of their unbelief."

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. The awful justice of JEHOVAH towards his ancient people, when they "believed not," (Note, 3:14—19.) called emphatically on their descendants "to fear," with a humble and jealous distrust of their own hearts, a diligent self-examining attention to every means of grace, and a careful watchfulness against temptation, lest they should fall under a still more terrible condemnation. "A promise" indeed of "entering into rest," under the Messiah and in heaven, had been left them in the Scriptures, as a legacy from their believing progenitors, for whose sake they had been thus favoured; and they were earnestly invited, by the preaching of the gospel, to partake of that promised benefit: but it behooved them to fear, "lest any of them should appear to come short of it," and so be excluded from heaven, as their fathers had been from Canaan. Nay, they ought to fear, lest they should seem to themselves, or to others, to be in danger of doing this, either during their lives, or when death approached; and this must be the case, if they rejected or renounced the gospel; and would probably be so, if they grew remiss or wavering in the profession of it. "The glad tidings," of entering into this rest, had been preached to them, even as they had more obscurely been declared to their fathers; whose unbelief and consequent disobedience had excluded them from Canaan, and from that better "rest" of heaven typified by it. For the "word of hearing had not profited them," "not being mixed with faith," or joined by the faith "of those who heard it." The ancient Israelites were destitute of faith, by which they might receive the word spoken by Moses into their hearts, for the appropriation of the benefit, so as to render it a principle of obedience: and in like manner, the clearer revelation of the gospel would be unprofitable to the Hebrews; unless they had faith in it, and thus received it in a dependent and obedient manner. Of all that vast multitude which fell in the wilderness, not one came short of Canaan, by the power of any enemy; or because of his past sins, or present weakness; or for any other cause, except the want of true faith; and none who hear the gospel are excluded from heaven, on any account whatever, except through unbelief. 'He proves ... that the promise to give Abraham and his Seed the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, was really a promise to give believers, of all nations, the everlasting possession of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the emblem: and that the oath which excluded the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness from Canaan, likewise excluded from the heavenly country all that continue in their sins. So that, in this ancient oracle, a future state, with its rewards and punishments was actually made known to the Jews.' Macknight.

V. 3—11. The apostle laid it down as a principle, that "those who believe," and they only, "enter into rest," even that rest which was especially intended. They have the title to that inheritance, and earnests of it, in peace with God and confidence in him, delight in his love and service, hope and joy through the power of the Holy Spirit, and a full persuasion that happiness can only be found in the favour and salvation of the Lord Jesus. (Notes, Ps. 116:7. Jer. 6:16,17. Matt. 11:28—30. Rom. 5:1—5.) It was evident that more than 'the rest of Canaan' was meant, in the Scriptures to which he referred; as God had said, "If they shall enter into my rest," with allusion to the Sabbath; though the works of creation, from which he ceased, and in which he rested with infinite satisfaction, as being "very good," had been "finished from the foundation of the world;" above two thousand five hundred years before he spake thus of the unbelieving Israelites: for it was thus written in a passage of scripture well known to the Hebrews, concerning the original institution of the Sabbath. (Notes, Gen. 2:1,2. Ex. 20:11. 31:13—17.) And yet God said, so many ages after, that they "should not enter into his rest." (Note, Num. 14:27—30.) This implied that the rest of Israel, in Canaan, was a type of a more spiritual and sacred rest, satisfaction, and felicity, in him and his glory, (in some degree resembling his own complacency in the perfect work of creation,) which would be conferred on his believing people. The exclusion of the generation from Canaan, to whom that rest was first preached, or proposed as glad tidings, implied that it remained for some others to enter in, which their posterity accordingly did; and the language denoted, that, while, through unbelief, numbers came short of the better rest of heaven, yet it was purposed that some should enter into it by faith. In confirmation of which, another day was limited, "by the Holy Spirit in David," many ages afterwards, during which believers would "enter into rest," but after which unbelievers would be irrevocably excluded. (Note, 3:7—13.) This was addressed to those who were actually in possession of the promised land, and at the height of their prosperity as a nation; it therefore evidently related to another and better rest than that of Canaan; from which unbelief would exclude even the inhabitants of that good land. For if "Jesus," (or Joshua, as it would have been better rendered, to prevent mistake and ambiguity,) had given Israel the true rest intended for believers; God would not so long after have spoken "of another day." Joshua had indeed given Israel rest, from the fatigues and wanderings of the desert, and from the hardships and perils of war, by their settlement in Canaan: (Note, Josh. 23:1.) yet there evidently "remained for the people of God" another and better rest, even the keeping of a perpetual and most blessed Sabbath; for the word is changed, to express the idea the more strongly. This was reserved for them in heaven, where they have done with sin, temptation, pain, conflict, fear, death, labour, and disappointment; and enjoy uninterrupted, unalloyed, ineffable and eternal delight, in God and his holy worship and service.—This point the apostle argued from the Old Testament so carefully, because the Sadducees entirely denied, that any better recompense than temporal prosperity was to be expected; and the Jews in general were prone to overlook the spiritual blessings proposed to them, in the promises made to their fathers, and to confine their thoughts wholly to the temporal sanctions of the national covenant, made with them at mount Sinai. (Note, Ex. 19:1)—The sacred writer therefore added, that "he who had entered into his rest," had ceased from his own works, in which he had previously been occupied; even as God ceased from creating, when he rested on the Sabbath-day.—Thus Jesus, the Messiah, had finished his work on earth, and had entered into his rest in heaven, as "the Forerunner" of his people: thus the souls of the righteous have ceased from their self-denying labours, and are enjoying their gracious recompense: and thus the believer, when brought to rest in the mercy and love of God, through Jesus Christ, ceases from all his allowed works of sin and folly, as well as from his vain endeavours to "establish his own righteousness," or to effect his own happiness.—As such blessings, therefore, were most certainly attainable by those who diligently sought them; and as the promised rest would so abundantly repay all their previous hardships and conflicts; it behooved them "to labour" in the use of all appointed means and in the persevering attendance on every duty, "to enter into this rest," and to obtain the assurance and earnest of it; fearing, lest any one of them should fall under condemnation, "after the same example of unbelief," by which their ancestors had been excluded from Canaan. The application, by the singular pronoun, is rendered a warning to each individual. The apostle's reasoning, from the Old Testament, concerning another rest, entirely distinct from the rest in Canaan; even "the keeping of a Sabbath reserved for the people of God," which unbelievers even in Canaan came short of, is conclusive against all those moderns, who labour to prove, that the doctrine of a future state of righteous retribution was no part of the religion of Israel, as well as against the ancient Sadducees. The proof of this doctrine, from comparing two passages in the books of Moses, with one in the Psalms, is as clear and conclusive, as our Lord's proof of the resurrection, by what JEHOVAH said to Moses from the bush: (Note, Matt. 22:22—33.) and probably the apostle knew the Pharisees in general would have allowed, that all who rejected it "erred, not knowing the Scriptures."

V. 12, 13. It has been greatly controverted, whether the Holy Scriptures, or the personal "Word of God," be spoken of in these verses: but St. Paul never calls our Lord by that title; and it appears to me, that the apostle meant the written word; and that he made a gradual transition from the word spoken, to him who spake it.—The Hebrews should not be surprised, to find such deep and interesting truths couched under the typical events of their history, or contained in other parts of their Scriptures; for these were, "the word of God." This is no lifeless, feeble, or formal instruction, like the traditions and glosses of the scribes: but it is "quick and powerful," a "living," active, energetic word: suited to be the instrument of the Holy Spirit, in "quickening those who are dead in sin," and in awakening, convincing, and alarming the most careless and insensible of mankind. (Note, Jer. 23:28, 29.) It is even "sharper than any twoedged sword," which would cut each way: for it can pierce the heart and conscience, like the irresistible lightning; forcing convictions and alarms upon the most haughty and obstinate; showing men their past and present sins, in all their odiousness, numberless multitude, and manifold aggravations; detecting the unsuspected pride, enmity, rebellion, ingratitude, and other evils of the heart; distinguishing men's characters with the clearest evidence, and exposing the base motives of their most specious actions. Thus, by exhibiting the glory of the divine perfections, men's relations and obligations to the great Creator; the spirituality, extent, excellency, and sanction of the law; the evil and desert of sin, and the depravity of the human heart, in a variety of ways, and a multiplicity of experiments; it forces conviction of guilt and danger upon the sinner, and compels him, as it were, to condemn himself and seek deliverance: nor can any kind of delusion or hypocrisy stand before its penetrating energy, when experimentally and fully preached, and applied to the hearts of men according to their various characters. It is, as it were, a sword, which can pierce so deep, and cut so keenly, as to divide between "soul and spirit;" and to penetrate the joints and marrow, which no other sword can reach: being, in plain language, a "discerner" of men's most secret thoughts and intentions; so that it often shows them their most hidden purposes, and makes them afraid of being openly named and exposed; as if the preacher knew their hearts, far better than they did themselves, and had a register before him even of those sins which they have forgotten. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, Matt. 7:28,29. John 8:3—11. 1 Cor. 14:20,25. 2 Cor. 4:1,2. 10:1—6.) Thus "the word of God," is "the sword of the Spirit," in the hands of Christ, as well as in the hands of his people. (Notes, Is. 11:2—5. Rev. 1:12—20. 2:14—16.) For the Lord himself is the Speaker, when his own word is properly declared and applied: he discerns, and by his word detects the "thoughts and intents of the heart;" nor "is there any creature," who is not wholly manifest in every respect in his sight: before whom "all things are naked," as stripped of all disguise; "and opened," being fully understood by him "with whom we have to do," as with our Lawgiver and Judge, and to whom we must at length render an account of all our conduct, and of all our most secret thoughts, motives, and intentions.—The expressions "naked and opened," are supposed to refer to the sacrifices, which were flayed, and opened, and cleft down the chine; and then every part of the body and of the intestines which were before concealed, were exposed to the exact inspection of the priest.

V. 14—16. As conviction and condemnation must be inevitable to sinners, before an omniscient Judge, whose "living and powerful word" forces men even here to condemn themselves; (Note, 1 John 3:18—24.) it was the more needful for the Hebrews to regard the "great High-Priest," whom he was recommending to them, "even Jesus the Son of God." For he, having appeared in human nature, as in the court of the sanctuary, to offer his atoning sacrifice; had passed "into the heavens," the immediate presence of the Father; as the high-priest passed through the first sanctuary into the holiest of all, to sprinkle the blood, and burn the incense, on the great day of expiation. (Notes, Lev. 16:11—22.) It also behooved them to hold fast "the profession" of the gospel, and that confession of faith in Christ, which they had made when baptized, amidst all possible dangers and persecutions. (Notes, 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) For "they had not a High-Priest," who disregarded, or could not sympathize with them in their pains and sufferings for his sake; or who would make no allowance for their infirmities, or refuse assistance in their temptations. But they had One, who, to procure their pardon and salvation, had voluntarily submitted to be tried and "tempted," even as they were; as far as he could be, without a sinful nature, or the least sin in his life: and this exemption was needful, in order that he might be their Sacrifice and their Advocate. (Notes, 2:16—18. 7:23—28.) As, therefore, there was a mercy-seat above the ark of the covenant, in the most holy place, before which the high-priest once a year appeared in behalf of the people, and over which the glory of God was displayed, as propitious to them; even so God the Father was, as it were, placed on "a throne of grace," "a mercy-seat," in the heavenly sanctuary, before which Jesus appeared as "the High-Priest" of his people, through whom God waited to receive petitions, to grant pardons, and to communicate blessings, to all who applied for them, in humble faith and by fervent prayer. (Notes, Ex. 25:10—22. Lev. 16:2—4,20—22.) Let then every one of them, before they should be summoned to the throne of judgment, come with humble confidence in Christ, and in the love of the Father through him, to supplicate forgiveness and mercy at the throne of grace; and to ask for seasonable and sufficient grace, to support, comfort, strengthen, and sanctify them, as their temptations, trials, and services required; not fearing a refusal, but boldly and freely, yet with reverence and lowliness, enlarging and multiplying their requests; being fully assured of their heavenly Father's readiness to do for them even "more than they could ask or think." PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. Blessed be God, that "the gospel is preached to us," even as to the primitive Christians, and far more clearly than to Israel of old. "Exceedingly great and precious promises" are "given to us," of entering into "the heavenly rest:" yet we should "rejoice with trembling" in our outward advantages; lest any of us should be found at last to come short of the blessing, and to sink under proportionably deeper condemnation, through unbelief. Nay, it is a very dreadful consequence of a wavering profession, or an inconsistent or negligent conduct, that it often causes men to "seem to come short," even when they are launching into eternity: they leave the world in gloomy doubt, and their survivors in distressing uncertainty, whether they are gone to heaven or to hell. Let us then "give diligence, that we may have an abundant entrance ministered to us into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord." (Note, 2 Pet. 1:10,11.) Under every dispensation, God has declared man's REST to be in him, and in his love, as the only suitable and sufficient happiness of the soul; and faith in his promises, through his Son, as the only way of "entering into that rest." His rich mercy, the plenteous redemption of Christ, and the word of the gospel, will not profit those who do not unite faith with his gracious proposals; for many have heard and professed the truth, who are even now finally excluded from the promised "rest because of unbelief;" their state is determined, and all their sabbaths and ordinances have only served to increase their condemnation. Many thousands join them every day, to whom, could we address them, we could only say, 'Had you attended yesterday, it might have been well; but now it is for ever too late.' To survivors, however, we may still say, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice;" and the present is "an accepted time, and a day of salvation." (Note, 2 Cor. 6:1,2.) Many, also, are continually entering into the earnest and beginning of this rest by faith; and others into the full possession of it, by dying in the Lord. Then they have done with all their sorrows, sins, and temptations; and their groans and tears are exchanged for unalloyed and perfect serenity and satisfaction. Let sinners then "labour to enter into this rest," "lest they should fall after the example" of ancient unbelievers, and perish with heaven before their eyes: let believers abide in Christ by faith and obedience, and learn to delight in his holy day and sacred ordinances, as earnests of their expected eternal sabbath, and preparations for it: let them bear up under fatigues and hardships, in the prospect of heavenly rest; and, if ever drawn aside, let them recollect these things, and say to themselves, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." (Note, Ps. 116:7. P. O. 1—9.)

V. 12—16. While we find, by experience, that "the word of God is living and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword," to penetrate the heart and conscience; let us remember, that the Lord himself is the "Discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart," before whom "all creatures are manifest," and "all things are naked and opened." (Note, Rev. 2:20—23.) "With him we have to do," and to him we are accountable: and if, under faithful preaching, we find our hearts condemn us, we are sure that "God is greater than our hearts, and knoweth all things." Instead therefore of objecting to a heart-searching ministry, and choosing such lifeless, feeble instructions, as are more like a shaken reed, than "a twoedged sword," let us lay open our inmost souls to the piercing strokes of the distinguishing word of God; that we may learn our need of that great High-Priest, even the Son of God, who now pleads for us before his Father's throne in heaven. In proportion as we know and condemn ourselves, and abhor our sins; he will become more and more precious to our souls, and we shall cleave to him more constantly. The thoughts of the holiness and heart-searching knowledge of God, and our consciousness of guilt and infirmity, will endear to us the Redeemer's condescension and compassion; and we shall rejoice that he can be "touched with the feeling of our infirmities," and that 'he knows what sore temptations mean,' though he was perfectly free from sin. Let us then approach continually to "the throne of grace," where our reconciled God deems it his peculiar honour to pardon rebels, and to answer the prayers of those who supplicate his favour in the name of his beloved Son: let as improve the day of his patience, and approach in his appointed way; let us come with believing boldness, as well as with adoring reverence and humble repentance; let us seek for mercy to pardon our sins, to compassionate our miseries, and to supply our necessities; and let us supplicate grace sufficient for us, in all our trials and temptations, and to enable us for the service of every day: thus waiting, as humble pensioners, at "the throne of grace," which is our best preparation for appearing before the tribunal of our omniscient and holy Judge.

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—4. In order more fully to show the nature and efficacy of the high-priesthood of Christ, the apostle made some introductory observations on that of Aaron; which tended to manifest its insufficiency, and to point out its typical meaning, as well as to illustrate his subject. "Every high-priest," selected from among men, was "ordained" and appointed for the benefit of men, in "things pertaining to God," or the great concerns of religion. That office required him who sustained it, to present before God the oblations and sin-offerings of the people: nor would he accept of any services which were not offered in that way; and this continually testified, that sinners were unworthy to approach their offended Creator, save through an expiatory sacrifice, and an intercessor. (Notes, Ex. 28:1. Lev. 16:17. Num. 16:45—50. 18:1.) The high-priest was indeed the head of the whole priesthood; but all the other priests descended from Aaron, who had first obtained this office in Israel, and, in some sense, were one with him. It was, moreover, proper that the high-priest should be capable of "compassionating," in a proportionate and reasonable manner, his brethren, who had sinned through ignorance and infirmity; or who were drawn aside from the right path, by any seducer, or seduction, for which things especially the sin-offerings were appointed. (Notes and P. O. Lev. 4: Notes, 5:1—6. 16:2—16. Ps. 19:12—14.) Now this was provided for, by ordaining men of like passions with others to that office; who, "being compassed with" natural and moral "infirmities," were as liable to mistake or sin as they. It was therefore prescribed, that they should offer sacrifices for their own sins, as well as for those of the people; which was a plain intimation, that they could only be typical high-priests, being not worthy to appear before God in their own cause, but with the shedding of blood. (Notes, 7:26—28. 9:24—26. 10:1—10. Lev. 9: P. O.) Nor might any man assume this honourable office of his own will, or by human appointment; but it was confined to those whom God expressly called to the execution of it, as he did Aaron and his posterity after him: and if any one else presumed to perform the least part of its peculiar duties, he did it at the hazard of his life; which showed, that it derived all its efficacy from the appointment of God, and not from its own intrinsic value.

Can have compassion. (2) Μετριοπαθειν δυναμενος. "Can reasonably bear with." Marg. Here only. To feel moderately; so as to make proper allowances, without conniving at wilful sins.—Them that are out of the way.] Πλανωμενοις. 3:10.

V. 5, 6. According to these prefigurations, Christ had not taken honour to himself, by acting as the High-Priest of his people, without express warrant; but the Father had in the Old Testament openly declared that the Messiah should sustain that office; for, as he said in one place, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," when announcing his decree concerning the Messiah's kingdom; (Notes, 1:5—7. Ps. 2:7—9.) so had he as expressly made known his appointment to the priesthood in another prophecy. (Notes, 7—10. 6:16—20. 7:1—22. Ps. 110:4.) But the Jews had paid far more regard to the predictions of his kingdom, than to those of his priesthood, through their prejudices for the Levitical law.—Some expositors, interpreting the expression, "This day have I begotten thee," of Christ's resurrection; (though that was only the proof, and not in any sense the cause or origin of his Sonship; (Note, Acts 13:24—37.) have argued, that he did not officiate as a Priest, till after he arose from the dead; as if offering himself as a Sacrifice for sin was no part of his priestly office! But the typical meaning of the legal ceremonies will sufficiently expose the gross absurdity of this supposition, as we proceed with the subject.—The quotations are from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew. (Ps. 2:7. 110:4.)

V. 7—10. Our Lord, though perfectly free from all sin, came as near to the condition of a sinner as he possibly could. He was "compassed about" with the sinless infirmities of our frail nature: he "appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh;" he was dealt with as a sinner, both by God and man; he endured the most violent temptations, sufferings, and agonies: and even his soul was full of consternation, and of horror unspeakable. This was "in the days of his flesh," subsequent to his incarnation; and previous to his exaltation; when his human nature became incapable of suffering, and was made inconceivably glorious. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—54. Phil. 3:20,21.) His humiliation and distresses were extreme in his agony in the garden. (Notes, Matt. 26:36—46. Luke 22:36—46.) Then especially he offered up to his Father most earnest "prayers and supplications," accompanied "with strong cries and tears," as vehement expressions of his inward anguish: he addressed himself to God, "as able to save him from death, and he was heard" and answered, "because of his piety," his reverence of the divine Majesty, his love, and his zeal for the glory of the Father: or, as many commentators explain it, "He was heard, and delivered from his fear." No doubt the most distressing dread of that awful wrath of God against our sins, which he had undertaken to endure, was one cause of our Lord's agony in the garden. This might well oppress his human soul, without his having the least apprehension, that he should finally sink under it, or come short of "the joy set before him;" or the least distrust of the Father's faithfulness to his engagement;—without any defect in his patience and submission, or any degree of sin. For the prospect of the temporary and even transient enduring of such a load of guilt and wrath was sufficient to excite the most overwhelming consternation. (Note, John 12:27—33.)—Thus, it appeared, that he had communion with his brethren in the passion, or feeling, most foreign to the divine nature, even fear, which is never ascribed to God, as many others are; and that he could sympathize with them in it, and deliver them from it. And, indeed, though he was not delivered from dying; though "the cup did not pass from him," but he willingly submitted to drink it, yet he was delivered from that agonizing terror, which dictated his "supplications with strong crying and tears;" and was afterwards calm and composed under his heaviest sufferings.—Learned men have clearly shown, by pertinent examples, that the words may well bear this sense: and it seems more exactly to suit the apostle's argument. Our Lord was not indeed spared, or exempted from any part of his expiatory sufferings, concerning which he said, notwithstanding the strong reluctancy of his holy human nature to such exquisite and complicated sufferings, "Thy will be done, knowing that it was "not possible for that cup to pass from him," consistently with the glory of the Father, and the salvation of his people. Yet the horror of his mind was allayed, he was strengthened to support the immense weight of suffering which was laid upon him; his sacrifice was accepted for his people; he was raised from the dead, exalted to the mediatorial throne, and invested with the power of "saving to the uttermost all who come to God through him." CHAPTER VI.

The apostle purposes to lead the Hebrews forward in the knowledge of Christ, 1—3. He shows the desperate state of apostates, 4—6; and illustrates it by a simile of barren land, which no culture improves, 7, 8. but declares his favourable opinion of the Hebrew Christians, and his desire of their fruitfulness and diligence, in order to their assured hope to the end, 9—12. He expatiates on the security of the covenant of grace, as confirmed to Abraham by the promise and oath of God, for the strong consolation of all future believers, 12—20.

THEREFORE [a]leaving the [*]principles of the doctrine of Christ, [b]let us go on unto perfecwhen "the Son of God" himself was appointed to the high-priesthood, he learned the difficulty of obeying the divine commandments, in the present circumstances of human nature, amidst the temptations and trials to which men are exposed: of this he acquired an experimental knowledge, as far as could consist with sinless perfection; and even his perfect obedience became more exalted and honourable; through[e] his whole life, by the enlargement of his human powers; and by the things which he suffered; so that his zeal and love were never so admirable and astonishing, as when he agonized in the garden, and hung upon the cross. Thus by his appointment to the high-priesthood, by the obedience which he finished amidst sufferings and unto death, by the efficacy of his sacrifice, and by his subsequent exaltation, "he was made perfect," as Mediator, being fully authorized and qualified for his gracious work: and so he became "the author of eternal salvation to all those" of the whole human race, "who obey" his call to repentance, to faith, and to take his yoke upon them; mercifully giving them all things pertaining to that deliverance, as the purchase of his own blood, and leading them forth to all those conflicts and services, which are connected with their "laying hold of eternal life." For all this springs from his having been nominated, and acknowledged by God, "as a High-Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek;" a King as well as a High-Priest, and so of a nobler order than that of Aaron. (Notes, 5:6. Gen. 14:18—20. Ps. 110:4. Zech. 6:12,13.)—It is observable, that Melchisekek is never mentioned in the Old Testament, after the account of his meeting with Abraham, as recorded in Genesis; except in the hundred and tenth Psalm: and never in the New Testament, except in the apostle's argument in this epistle concerning the high-priesthood of Christ; a subject of infinite importance, and proved beyond all reasonable doubt, by this single argument. (Notes, 7:1—22.) How much may depend on a detached testimony of Scripture, which superficial readers pass over unobserved, and to which perhaps very few carefully attend!

V. 11—14. Concerning Christ, as "a High-Priest after the order of Melchisedek," the apostle intended to discourse more fully: but the things which he had to say of him were such, that it would be difficult to state them in a proper manner: not so much because they were in themselves abstruse, as because the Hebrews were dull of hearing, through their prejudiced attachment to the Levitical law and priesthood. Though they had heard and professed the gospel so long, that it might have been expected they would have been capable of instructing others, in the great doctrine of redemption by Christ; they had so closed their minds to the truth, or turned aside from the purity of the faith, that they wanted some one to teach them anew the very rudiments of that religion which was contained in "the oracles of God," or the Old Testament, when rightly understood. (Notes, Acts 7:37—43. Rom. 3:1,2. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) They were become such Christians, as had need to be fed with milk, or to be taught the plainest and most obvious truths of the gospel; being incapable of receiving and profiting by its deeper and more spiritual doctrines. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) Indeed every man, who could only receive the simpler and more common truths of religion without applying his mind to the more experimental and exalted parts of it; must be considered as a babe in Christ, how long soever he had professed the gospel, being evidently "unskilful in the word of righteousness." But the more sublime doctrines of Christianity, which immediately related to the counsels of God for his own glory, and the display of his perfections by the redemption of Christ, and which indeed were obscurely intimated in the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, were as "strong meat" for those who were matured in knowledge, judgment, and experience; being the proper nourishment of their faith, hope, love, and spiritual affections. For such Christians, "by reason of use," or habit, acquired by assiduous meditation and unbiassed attention to the truth, had attained to a spiritual taste and relish for divine excellency; they had their spiritual "senses exercised to discern" or distinguish between good and "evil, truth and falsehood;" they could readily perceive the nature and tendency of the things proposed to them, and the comparative excellency or worthlessness of them: even as natural men, by a sound judgment and long-continued habits, decide at once upon natural things, with great accuracy; or as the bodily senses at once distinguish and judge of their proper objects. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Fallen men cannot approach God, except on "a mercy seat," through a high-priest, and by a sacrifice for sin: but "a priest, who was compassed with infirmity," and needed to offer sacrifice for himself, however he might compassionate the ignorant and transgressors, could never be an effectual advocate with God for them. Indeed, in the more ordinary work of the ministry, the consciousness of our own sinfulness and unworthiness, is well suited to render us tender to the weak, the erroneous, the tempted, and the fallen; "seeing we ourselves are compassed with infirmity:" and, though this service differs widely from that of the priests under the law, yet no man should take it upon him, till it appear to other competent persons, as well as himself, that "he is called of God" to it.—But Christ alone is qualified and authorized to be our High-Priest; his dignity and excellency as the Son of God, and his appointment by the Father to that office, give efficacy to his ministrations: his voluntary humiliation and sufferings, "in the days of his flesh, when he offered up prayers and supplications" to the Father, "with strong crying and tears," assure us of his tender love and compassion to his afflicted people; and the answer given to his earnest prayers, makes way for the granting of our weak and defiled petitions, when offered in his name. His obedience in our nature encourages our attempts to obey, and our expectations of support and comfort, under all the temptations and sufferings to which we are exposed: for "being made perfect" for this great work "he is become the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him." But are we of that number? Do we at present, whatever our former conduct has been, obediently receive his instructions as our Prophet, trust in his sacrifice and intercession as our Priest, and make his commandments the rule of our conduct, as the subjects of his kingdom? To those who thus come to him, and yield themselves to him, and to those alone, he will be "the Author of eternal salvation." Of this great High-Priest, and of his merits, grace, and authority, ministers have many things to say, which they will not be able to utter in a proper manner, unless "he give them a mouth and wisdom" for that purpose; and men's prejudices are so many and so strong, that they are generally more ready to take offence, than to receive instruction. Nor are professed Christians, even old professors of evangelical doctrine, so docile as might be expected: many are far from that spiritual maturity, which is proportioned to the time during which they have attended to the gospel. Instead of teaching others they need to be taught themselves "the first principles of the oracles of God;" they "need milk, and not strong meat;" they are babes in understanding, but not in teachableness; they are "unskilful in the word of righteousness," yet they often presume to dictate to their pastors! These things are very discouraging: but we should still exercise patience and meekness, and "seek out acceptable words," in which to convey instructions in the best manner we can. Aged professors of the gospel, as well as babes in Christ, should beware of prejudice, and pray for a mind open to conviction. We ought indeed to begin with simpler truths, and so gradually proceed to such as are more deep and perplexing: and to employ ourselves peculiarly about first principles, by an experimental and practical improvement of the truth: thus we shall gradually be matured in judgment, and enabled to digest strong meat: and our spiritual senses will be habituated to a just and exact discernment of good and evil; which will greatly tend to our stability, comfort, and fruitfulness in the faith of Christ. (Note, Phil. 1:9—11.)

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1—3. The apostle here proposed to lead the Hebrews into a fuller acquaintance with the deep mysteries of redemption, of which he had spoken, and thus to "go on unto perfection." (Note, 5:11—14.) In order to this, he would leave "the principles" or elements "of the doctrine of Christ." Without specially insisting on these things; he implicitly requested their attentive and candid perusal of his arguments on other subjects, suited to improvement of such as were no longer babes in Christ. (Notes, Eph. 4:14—16.) The necessity of "repentance from dead works," such as are done by men dead in sin, and which expose them to the condemnation of eternal death, was indeed fundamental to true Christianity: but they had been instructed in it from the first dawning of the new dispensation. (Notes, Matt. 3:2,7—10. 9:10—13.) Nor would he speak particularly of the nature and necessity of faith towards God, or a belief of his testimony, and a dependence on his mercy, grace, and faithful promises in Jesus Christ. (Notes, John 3:14—21,27—36. 5:24—27,39—44.) He did not indeed purpose to discourse concerning "the doctrine of baptisms;" either the various legal washings, whether by immersion, ablution, or sprinkling; or John's baptism, and that of Christ, which were distinct from each other, or concerning the traditional baptisms of the Pharisees. (Notes, 9:8—10. Matt. 3: 5,6. 15:1,2. Mark 7:3,4. John 3:22—26.) Neither would he treat of "the laying on of" the apostles' "hands," by which miraculous powers were conferred, as evidential of the truth of the gospel; or "the laying on of hands" in the ordination of ministers, as a significant token of the authority intrusted to them. (Notes, Acts 6:2—6. 8:14—24. 19:1—6.) Nor would he insist upon the important doctrine of "the resurrection of the dead," or that of "eternal judgment," the consequences of which will be eternal happiness or eternal misery. But, passing over these subjects for the present, he meant to explain to them the deeper and more spiritual mysteries of redemption by Christ; and he would proceed to execute his design, in the subsequent part of the epistle, if the Lord would permit him.—Some expositors explain these "principles of the doctrine of Christ," as relating wholly to instructions contained in the Old Testament, concerning the Messiah's kingdom: and some confine them exclusively to the new dispensation. Others favouring the former scheme, interpret "the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands," to signify the legal purifications, and the laying on of the hands of the offerer upon the head of the sacrifice, as typical of repentance and faith; including the words in a parenthesis. But, understanding by "principles," not the most fundamental truths, or parts of Christianity: but the introductory elements, the lower and easier beginnings of it, as letters are the first principles, or elements, or beginning (αρχη) of learning; we may see a propriety in the interpretation above given. Some of the things mentioned were, though most important in themselves, yet the more obvious and simple parts of Christianity; and the others were externals connected with the first profession of it, on which the Jews were apt to lay far more stress, than they ought to have done: and it was obvious for the apostle to mention these, when he would call them off from the introductory elements of Christianity, to its more sublime and spiritual doctrines.

(Note, Matt. 25:41—46.) 'Interpreters observe, that the doctrine of Origen, touching the period of the torments of the damned, is here condemned: and indeed the primitive fathers, not Origen himself excepted, taught the contrary.—If we do not the will of Christ, says Clemens Romanus, nothing will deliver us from eternal punishment. ... The punishment of the damned, says Justin Martyr, is endless punishment, and torment in eternal fire. Irenæus, in his symbol of faith, makes this one article, That Christ would send the ungodly and unjust into everlasting fire.—Tertullian declares, that all wicked men are appointed to eternal torments: and if any man, says he, thinks the wicked are to be consumed, and not punished, let him remember that hell-fire is styled eternal, because designed for eternal punishment; and their substance will remain for ever, whose punishment doth so. St. Cyprian saith, that the souls of the wicked are kept, with their bodies, to be grieved with endless tormenis. There is no measure nor end of their torment, saith Minutius. Lastly, Origen reckons this among the doctrines defined by the church; That every soul, when it goes out of this world, shall either enjoy the inheritance of eternal life and bliss, if its deeds have rendered it fit for life; or is to be delivered up to eternal fire and punishment, if its sins have deserved that state.' Whitby.

V. 4—6. It was the more proper to write, in the manner proposed, to the Hebrews; as those who adhered to Christianity had been sufficiently for a long time instructed in the introductory lessons; and those who had renounced it were in a most hopeless condition.—These verses have caused immense perplexity and distress to many timid and conscientious Christians; and they have been supposed to contain a cogent objection to the doctrine of the believer's final perseverance. These things must be in a measure adverted to in our examination of them. It should be remembered, that the apostle wrote in an age of miracles; and to the Hebrews, among whom the Holy Spirit was first poured out, in his extraordinary operations, as well as his renewing influences. (Notes, Acts 2:37—40. 5:32. 6:8. 8:14—17. 10:44—48. 19:1—4.) The persons whose case is described, had been "once enlightened," and had obtained that measure of knowledge concerning the truth and nature of Christianity, which enabled them to make a satisfactory profession of it, in order to their admission into the church; "they had tasted the heavenly gift, and been made partakers of the Holy Ghost;" being at their baptism, or afterwards, by the laying on of the apostles' hands, endued with some measure of spiritual gifts, or miraculous powers; such as speaking with tongues, or discoursing with supernatural fluency on divine subjects: so that, in this respect, "they had tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Spirit," and their own experience proved to them the truth of the gospel. They had moreover, "tasted of the good word of God," and their convictions, impressions, and affections, made them sensible that it was a "good word," of a holy and salutary tendency, and that it was for their good to attend to it; and their purposes of doing so had produced such hopes and joys, as have been described in the case of the stony-ground hearer. (Notes, Matt. 13:20—22. Mark 6:15—29.) Thus they had tasted of "the powers of the world to come," in their temporary realizing apprehensions of a future state, and of its happiness or misery: or, they had experienced the powers communicated under the dispensation of the Messiah. All these things, except miraculous gifts, often take place in the hearts and consciences of men, in these days, who yet continue unregenerate. They have knowledge, convictions, fears, hopes, joys, and seasons of apparent earnestness, and deep concern about eternal things; and they are endued with such gifts as often make them acceptable and useful to others: but they are not truly humbled; they are not spiritually minded; religion is not their element and delight; they do not cordially receive Christ in all his offices, or sincerely love the spiritual excellency of his people, his ordinances, and commandments. In short, the old nature, the principle of selfishness, is impressed, affected, interested, alarmed, or pleased: but a new nature is not produced, and therefore "in time of temptation they fall away."—In respect of spiritual gifts, or the miraculous "powers of the Holy Ghost," our Lord most expressly declares, that he will reject many who had been partakers of them, saying to them, "I never knew you." (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.)—Yet those who received gifts of this kind from Christ, through the laying on of the hands of his apostles, had a personal demonstration of the truth of Christianity, which the most enlightened apostates in these days can scarcely be supposed to have had: and therefore but few instances now occur, in which a conclusion concerning their state can be unreservedly drawn in the apostle's awful words; though the case of some may be nearly similar and they alone are immediately concerned in them. (Notes, 10:26,27. 2 Tim. 4:14,15. 1 John 5:16—18.) If the persons whom the apostle had thus characterized, (for he spake of none else,) had totally apostatized from Christianity, and were become its avowed enemies, it was not the minister's duty to bestow pains about them; it was found "impossible to renew them to repentance," and thus to "restore them in the spirit of meekness." For, considering the clear light against which they sinned in so desperate a manner, it might be concluded, that they had committed "the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit," and had ascribed his operations, and the miracles wrought, by themselves, and by others, as well as the holy joys and experience of true believers, to a satanical influence. (Note, Matt. 12:31,32.) In fact, as far as they could, "they crucified to themselves the Son of God afresh:" despitefully showing that they approved the conduct of those who nailed him to the cross; they assented to their deed: and apparently wished it in their power to repeat his ignominy and torture; and they "put him to an open shame," by renouncing his religion, blaspheming his name, joining his enemies, and doing evil to his disciples. They were, therefore, to be considered as given up to final obduracy, and left to the awful judgment of God.—This conclusion, however, by no means authorized ministers finally to exclude from the communion of the church those apostates, who professed repentance, and appeared to be true penitents; much less did it warrant such rigour in less aggravated cases. In general, encouragement should be held forth to all, who appear penitent; nay, to induce the most obdurate to repentance: and means are in most cases to be used for the recovery of such as have most lamentably turned aside; though ill success will often discourage the benevolent endeavour. The very words, however, of this awful passage prove, that all who "are renewed unto repentance" shall be pardoned; and that God leaves all to final impenitence whom he determines not to save. (Note, Tim. 2:23—26.) So that the trembling sinner, who pleads guilty, and cries for mercy, can have no ground for discouragement from this passage, fairly interpreted, whatever his crimes have been: for all who are "renewed to repentance" are saved, and none else. Neither does it prove that any one, who is "in Christ a new creature," ever becomes a final apostate from him. (Note, 9,10.) —Impossible. (4) If God "swear in his wrath that any man shall not enter into his rest," (Notes, 3:17—19.) he is so given up to hardness of heart, that his case resembles that of fallen angels, or the damned: and the same impossibility of repentance takes place as exists in respect of them.

V. 7, 8. The different sorts of professed Christians might be compared to fruitful and barren land. (Notes, Matt. 13:3—8,18—23.) The believer resembled a field, which, being well watered by the rain from heaven, yielded a valuable produce to repay the husbandman's toil; the fertile appearance and useful fruits of which showed, that it had "received a blessing from God." Thus, the true Christian, by divine grace, being enabled to improve ordinances and advantages, so as to become fruitful in genuine good works, honourable to the Lord, and profitable to men, was blessed, and would be still more so. But, as the sterile soil, which neither by the rain nor the husbandman's labour could be made to produce any thing better than thorns and briers, was generally left as a neglected desert, under the original curse, being fit for nothing with all its produce but to be burned; so the mere nominal Christian, continuing unfruitful under the means of grace, or producing nothing but hypocrisy, selfishness, and iniquity, was likely to be left under the curse of the law; was near to the awful state above described; and everlasting misery in the flames of hell was the end reserved for him, if he continued in his present unfruitfulness.—This was a solemn warning to professed Christians to beware, that they were not left to apostatize, as the punishment of their unfruitfulness. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Deut. 29:19—28. Matt. 25:41—46.)

V. 9, 10. While the apostle spoke such awful and alarming truths, with reference to the case of those to whom he knew them to be seasonable; he would not have it thought, that he had an unfavourable opinion of the Hebrew Christians in general, or of those whom he immediately addressed in particular. On the contrary, he and his fellow labourers, were "persuaded better things of them, even things which accompany salvation:" namely, that they were real penitents, humble believers, spiritually minded, and rooted and grounded in the love of Christ, and of his cause and people. The expression is remarkable and emphatical: the things before spoken of (Note, 4—6.) might, or they might not "accompany," or be inseparably connected with "salvation:" but those things of which he now spake, were always found in true converts, and never in any others.—"Nothing availeth in Christ ... but faith which worketh by love"—"but a new creation." "Hereby we know, that we are passed from death unto life; because we love the brethren."—"To be spiritually minded is life and peace." (Notes, Matt. 5:3—12. Rom. 8:5—9. 2 Cor. 5:17. Gal. 5:1—6. 6:15,16. Eph. 2:4—10. 1 John 3:13—15.) There is no intimation in the whole Bible, that any one, who ever had these things, came short of eternal salvation; or that any apostate ever possessed them. —The apostle especially referred in this, to those Jewish converts, who had manifested their love to the name of God, as revealed in Christ, by their works, yea, their laborious services, and "in ministering to the saints" for his sake. (Notes, 10:32—34. 1 Thes. 1:f—4.) Of this, a most admirable specimen had been given, after the day of Pentecost; and many of them still continued the same disinterested, self-denying conduct. (Notes, Acts 2:44—47. 4:32—35.) These genuine evidences of "faith working by love," God would not reject or forget: "he was not unrighteous:" and therefore he would not fail to deal with them, according to his promises and covenant engagements to believers, who have, "through grace" a claim upon him on that ground. (Notes, 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 1 John 1:8—10.)

We are persuaded. (9) Πεπεισμεθα. Rom. 15:14. 2 Tim 1:5,12.—Accompany.] Εχομενα. 12:28. 1 Tim. 1:19. Are connected with salvation.—Labour of love. (10) Κοπου της αγαπης. 1 Thes. 1:3.

V. 11, 12. The apostle and his brethren earnestly desired and longed, that every one of those whom he addressed, might thenceforth show the same attentive and disinterested "diligence" in good works, which some had heretofore shown: that so, evidencing his faith to be genuine, beyond all reason for doubt or hesitation, he might obtain and possess the "full assurance of hope," in respect of his final salvation, to comfort him under all trials, even to the end of life. Thus the whole company would be distinguished from "slothful," unfruitful professors of Christianity; and be approved as "imitators" of their pious progenitors; and of those Christians, who by faith in the promises of God, and "patient continuance in well-doing, and in waiting his time of deliverance from trials, had at length entered into rest, and were actually enjoying that perfect felicity, in which all the promises of God to his people centered. (Note, 10:35—39.)—This is a conclusive proof of the immediate happiness of believers after death; if the above be the true interpretation; and, after having maturely considered the other interpretation of the passage, which some learned men have given; the author hesitates not to say, that he considers them as absurd. He has no doubt the apostle meant to lead his readers to meditate on the happiness of Abraham, Moses, Joshua, and Job, and all others, who had on earth lived by faith in the promises of God, especially the great promise of a Saviour, and eternal salvation by him; had patiently waited, laboured, and suffered, in the obedience of faith; and in consequence were, at the time when the apostle wrote this, inheriting the promises of God, of eternal blessings through Christ to all believers.—"Assurance of hope" (11) should be distinguished from "the assurance of understanding," (Note, Col. 2:1—4.) and from "the assurance of faith." (Note, 10:19—22.) He who so understands the gospel, as to perceive the relation of each part to all the rest, and its use as a part of one grand design; in something of the same manner, that a skilful anatomist understands the use and office of every part of the human body, in relation to the whole; has "the full assurance of understanding;" and those things which appear inconsistent, useless, or superfluous to others, he perceives essentially necessary to the system, or great design. The man, who is fully convinced, that this consistent and harmonious, though complicated design, is the work and revelation of God; and has no doubt the things testified are true, that the promises and threatenings will be fulfilled, and that Christ will certainly save all true believers, has "the full assurance of faith:" though he may, through misapprehension, or temptation, or other causes, doubt of his own personal interest in this salvation. But he, who beyond doubt or hesitation is assured, that he himself is a true believer, interested in all the precious promises, sealed by the sanctifying Spirit, and "a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed;" has "the full assurance of hope."—"The full assurance of faith," is the duty of every one: for he who doubts the truth of the testimony, or the faithfulness of the promises of God, questions his veracity: (Note, 1 John 5:9, 10.) but "the full assurance of hope," must be obtained and preserved by diligence; and, though the want of it may generally be traced to a criminal source, it is not the proximate duty of every one, in fact of a very few. (Notes, 1 Pet. 3:13—16. 2 Pet. 1:10,11.) A man may question, whether the paper in his possession be a genuine bank-bill, or a counterfeit; and yet have no doubt, either of the ability or willingness of the directors of the bank, to honour every genuine bank-bill.—"The full assurance of hope," in the highest meaning of the words, is attained by comparatively few; and is seldom if ever preserved, without some degree of diminution or variation, through the remainder of life: but a prevailing assurance of acceptance, and of final salvation, is the privilege of all diligent and consistent Christians; and is, in them, seldom greatly interrupted, except by misapprehension, or by peculiar temptations and conflicts, or by their being betrayed into sin.

V. 13—15. There could be no reason to doubt of the Lord's performing his promise to those who trusted him, and waited for him: for the covenant ratified with Abraham, in some respects typified, and in others was substantially the same with that made with every believer: (Notes, Ex. 19:1. Rom. 4:9—25. Gal. 3:6—29.) and when God gave the promises to "the Father of the faithful, he at length was pleased to confirm them with an oath, showing his irrevocable purpose of accomplishing them; and, "because he could swear by no greater, he swore by himself," and so pledged the honour of his great name and all his perfections, as the security of that engagement. (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. 15:5—21. 17:1—19. 22: 16—18.) Accordingly, Abraham "patiently waited" the Lord's time; and the promised blessings to him and his seed were at length vouchsafed. When old and full of days he died, and was personally blessed in God, as his "exceeding great Reward;" his posterity also increased; the promises made to them were accomplished; the Messiah at length came, and all the nations of the earth were now about to be blessed in him.—The quotation is not made exactly from the Septuagint, nor does it entirely accord with the Hebrew; (Gen. 22:16,17.) but it gives the general meaning, in words suited to the occasion.

After he had patiently endured. (15) Μακροθυμησας. Luke 18:7 Jam. 5:7. Note, 11,12.

V. 16—20. It is customary for men to swear by those who are greater than themselves, or whom they suppose to be so; and they call on them to witness their attestations or engagements, and to avenge their unfaithfulness if they fail of them. When important concerns require it, and the omniscient God is thus reverently and uprightly appealed to, it should be considered as an act of worship to him: and an oath, for the confirmation of covenants and treaties, is the means of terminating disputes of every kind, by establishing mutual confidence between the parties; from the persuasion, that men in general will not defy the vengeance of Heaven by deliberate perjury. The Lord, therefore, in condescension to the weakness of man, and his proneness to unbelief and purposing to give his people the most abundant assurance "that" his counsel "respecting their salvation was immutable;" confirmed the promise and covenant respecting it, with the most solemn ratification of an oath. That so, "by two immutable things," even the Word and the Oath, (or, as others understand it, 'by the immutable counsel, and inviolable oath') "in which it was impossible for God to lie," either by being deceived, or induced to deceive others, or by seeing cause to alter his purposes; they all (in the apostle's time, and consequently in all times) "who had fled for refuge" from the wrath to come, "to lay hold on the hope" of pardon and eternal life set before them in the gospel, might have a firm ground for assured hope, and the "powerful consolations" which spring from it. These persons, to whatever nation they belonged, were the "heirs of promise," the spiritual "children of Abraham," and interested in the covenant ratified to him and to his seed: (Note, 13—15. 11:8—10.) and therefore "the oath sworn to Abraham" irrevocably confirmed the spiritual blessings of that covenant to each of them. (Note, Luke 1:67—79.)—In order to ascertain that they were of this number; it was needful to inquire, whether they, having discovered their danger of falling under the curse of the broken law, and under the wrath of God, had renounced all other confidences, and broken through all hinderances, to "flee for refuge," (as the manslayer speeded towards the appointed city, Note, Num. 35:11—15.) to the rich mercy of God, through the redemption of Christ, according to the covenant of grace; laying hold on this Object of a sinner's hope, which God himself has placed before us for that purpose, by a humble persevering reliance on his promises through Jesus Christ, manifested by its genuine effects. (Notes, Rom. 3: 19—26.) Those who had thus "fled for refuge, to lay hold on the hope set before them," had a "strong consolation" given them in the oath and covenant of God. (Note, 2 Thes. 3:16,17.) In fact their conscious unworthiness, depravity, and weakness; their experience of the deceitfulness of their hearts; their conflicts with inward and outward enemies; and the various temptations, trials, and persecutions, to which their profession would expose them, rendered such security consolation, and hope in God needful to them, even as the anchor is to the ship. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:24—27. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. 1 John 3:1—3.) By this hope, as by an anchor, they would be preserved in their proper station, without being driven from their profession or duty by any storms; while others would be induced to apostacy, by worldly fears or hopes, or be drawn aside by manifold delusions: even as the ships, which have no anchor, will be driven by the tempest from their station on the rocks or sands, forced out to sea, or dashed in pieces one against another.—No anchors, however, can at all times secure the ship from driving, or being wrecked: but this hope in the divine promise, oath, and covenant, was so "sure" in itself, and kept the possessor so "steadfast" in his adherence to the truth and cause of God, that it always secured him from final ruin; and, in proportion to its vigorous exercise, from temporary failures also, and against the storms of incumbent temptations. For, it "entered into that within the veil" and fixed the heart in a stable union with those things which are in the true Holy of Holies, in heaven itself, and in joyful expectation of them; and caused the believer to stay himself on the power, truth, and love of God to sinners in Christ Jesus, to bring him to the enjoyment of that felicity. For thither its great object, Jesus the divine Saviour, had already entered, and continually ministered in the Father's presence, for the benefit of all believers: being their Forerunner and Representative, who,

CHAPTER VII.

The superiority of Melchisedek's typical priesthood, above that of Aaron, proved and illustrated, 1—10. It was intended, that the priesthood should be changed, and consequently that the ritual law of Moses should be disannulled, when the Messiah came; that a better covenant and priesthood might take place, 11—18. This was needful, for the more perfect state of the church, and for the salvation of all who come to God by Jesus Christ, to the uttermost, and for ever, 19—28.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The first principles and "rudiments of the doctrine of Christ" should be accurately understood, before men attempt to learn the sublimer mysteries of the gospel: yet they must not always be confined to them, but should be "led on towards perfection," both in knowledge, experience, and holiness.—Even the fundamentals of "repentance from dead works, faith towards God, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment" should not engross men's whole attention: but every part of the truth and will of God should, in due order and proportion, be set before all who profess the gospel, and enforced on their hearts and consciences. Much less then should we perpetually be discoursing or disputing about "baptisms, and laying on of hands," and other externals; which have their place and use, but often occupy far too much of the attention and time of those who might be more profitably employed.—We cannot but lament to see those, who once made a credible profession of the gospel, turn back into the world and sin, and thus in a measure, "crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame;" as if, upon trial, they found nothing in his salvation worthy of their constant regard! In general we should warn and pray for such persons; but there are cases, in which we must let them alone, as having no prospect of their being "renewed to repentance." We should beware, and we ought to caution others, of every approach to so tremendous a precipice: yet in doing this, we should keep close to the word of God, and be careful not to wound and terrify the weak, or discourage the fallen and penitent.—Knowledge, gifts, convictions, and very strong impressions, must precede; or an apostacy of this kind cannot take place: great obstinacy and malignity must follow, before we are warranted to conclude it fatal or final. The general invitations and promises of the gospel include all, who are humbly willing to embrace them; humiliation and self-condemnation, when united with some hope and cries for mercy, are such tokens of God's "renewing a man to repentance," as should be pointed out to him, for his encouragement in expecting forgiveness. On the other hand, the self-confident should be taught, that knowledge, gifts, terrors, subsequent joys, and high affections, are no certain evidence of a man's conversion; without brokenness of heart, hatred of sin, a spiritual mind, and "faith which worketh by love." But those whom it is indeed "impossible to renew unto repentance," are commonly the last to think themselves in so awful a state: and such as are most harassed by fears of this kind, may generally be assured that this is not their case, whatever they have been, or done: unless they actually run into ungodliness and wickedness, through total desperation.

V. 7—12. A negligent and unfruitful profession of the gospel tends directly to the brink of that dreadful precipice above described: for when abundant means of grace, and even the ordinary strivings of the convincing Spirit of God, leave men unchanged, and produce not those fruits of holiness, which prove that they have received blessings from God, and are blessed of him: they are often given up, like waste land, to bear briars and thorns only: their state is nigh unto cursing; and the end of all unfruitful profession will be "the furnace of fire, where is wailing and gnashing of teeth."—Let us then fear with humble caution and watchful prayer, in respect of ourselves; and let us hope the best of others, that the case will admit of. Whilst we warn such as are in evident danger, we should encourage those in whom we judge that the "things which accompany salvation" are found. Ministers should frequently specify these, in an experimental and distinguishing manner: and, in respect of them all should examine themselves, frequently and seriously: instead of perplexing themselves about those texts which were inserted to serve as beacons, to warn the presumptuous against fatal rocks, and not to affright the humble and cautious. Of those "things which accompany salvation," none is more free from ambiguity than laborious self-denying love to the name of the Lord, shown by "ministering" with persevering affection "to his saints:" and, though God is no man's debtor, and will reward no works which proceed from pride and self-righteousness, however splendid and laborious they are; yet "he is not unrighteous:" nor will he forget one service, which springs from humble, grateful love. He has spoken, and he will be as good as his word, that "not a cup of cold water, given to a disciple" from regard to his Lord, "shall in any wise lose its reward." (Notes, Matt. 10:40—42. 25:34—40.) We should therefore earnestly desire that we, and all who are called Christians, may "give the same diligence" in such good works, as the most eminent saints in the primitive ages did. This is the scriptural way of acquiring and preserving "the full assurance of hope," to the end of our lives. Many have thus "by faith and patience inherited the promises;" but no slothful professor of Christianity has any evidence that he is following them to heaven.

V. 13—18. The privileges of the gospel belong to the diligent and fruitful, who walk in the steps of Abraham, to whom the promises were made. These obtain an inward testimony, by the powerful operation of the Holy Spirit; and give abundant proof in their lives, that they are "the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise." This inward seal confirms to them personally that covenant, which God has ratified "with an oath to the heirs of promise" in general. Because their infirmities are many, and their trials great, their condescending and compassionate Father is "willing more abundantly to show them the immutability of his counsel;" that, by his faithful word and irrevocable oath, "they might have a strong consolation, having fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them." Indeed the Lord, having "sworn by himself, that he hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner, but that he should repent and live," holds out abundant encouragement to all, whom he "warns to flee from the wrath to come," and invites to "lay hold for refuge on the hope set before them." And, as he "cannot lie," the destruction of the unbeliever, and the salvation of the believer, are alike certain. Let then such as have fled to Christ, and have their hope sealed to them, "by the love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Spirit," rely confidently on the power, truth, mercy, and covenant of God, amidst all the opposition of earth and hell. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:15—17,28—39.) Let them pray for faith and hope equal to their security: thus let them "cast anchor within the veil," staying their souls on the word of God, and on the meditation of their great High-Priest, in all dangers, afflictions and temptations: let them follow the steps, as well as trust in the merits, of the great Forerunner of his people. Let them by faith realize his appearance before the Father's throne for them, as their constituted High-Priest and King: for, while those who go before on earth, to prepare the way and make all ready for others, are commonly in many respects greatly their inferiors; our "Forerunner" is the "Lord of hosts, the King of glory," "God manifested in the flesh." (Notes, Ps. 24:7—10. Luke 1:11—17,76—79. Eph. 1:15,23. 4:7—10. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Let us, therefore, "set our affections, on things above," and wait patiently for his appearance, when we also shall most certainly "appear with him in glory." (Note, Col. 3:1—4.)

NOTES.—CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. The apostle had repeatedly referred to the prophecy, that the Messiah should be "a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedek," signifying that his priesthood would resemble that of Melchisedek, and not that of Aaron. (6:20. Notes, 5:5—10. Ps. 110:4.) He therefore next proceeded to illustrate that prophecy, and argue more explicitly from it, as compared with the scriptural account of this extraordinary person. (Note, Gen. 14:18—20.) "Melchisedek king of Salem," which probably means Jerusalem, and "priest of the most high God," by an appointment of which we have no information; "met Abraham," after he had vanquished the invading kings, who had carried Lot captive from Sodom: and, as "priest of the most high God," "he blessed" Abraham, and received of him "a tenth part of" the spoils taken from his conquered enemies. His very name, being by interpretation, "king of righteousness," and doubtless corresponding with his character and administration, marked him out as a type of the Messiah and of his kingdom. (Note, 1:8,9.) The name of his city signified Peace, and, as "king of peace," he typified Christ, "the Prince of Peace," the great Reconciler of God and man, and of men to one another, in perfect consistency with the interests of righteousness, and the honour of the divine law and justice. (Notes, Eph. 2:11—18. Col. 1:18—23.) And the union in Melchisedek of royal authority with the priestly office, (which were divided between the family of Aaron and that of David, end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth [e]a priest continually.

4 Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even [h]the patriarch [i]Abraham [k]gave the tenth of the spoils.

5 And verily, they that are of the sons of Levi, [l]who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment [m]to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they [n]come out of the loins of Abraham:

6 But he whose [o]descent is not counted from them, [o]received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that [p]had the promises.

7 And [q]without all contradiction, [r]the less is blessed of the better.

8 And here [s]men that die receive tithes; but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that [t]he liveth.

9 And, as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, [n]payed tithes in Abraham.

10 For he was yet [x]in the loins of his father, when Melchisedek met him.

11 If therefore [y]perfection were [z]by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) [a]what further need was there that [a]another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedek, and not be called after the order of Aaron?

12 For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity [b]a change also of the law.

13 For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, [c]of which no man gave attendance at the altar.

14 For it is evident that [d]our Lord [e]sprang out of Judah; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that [f]after the similitude of Melchisedek there ariseth another priest, 16 Who is made, not after [g]the law of a carnal commandment, but after [h]the power of an endless life.

17 For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek.

in the case of Israel,) plainly pointed to the Messiah, as "a Priest upon his throne." (Note, Zech. 6:12,13.)—No account is given of Melchisedek's parentage, or pedigree, as in the case of the priests appointed by the law; who were all required to prove their descent from Aaron, and exact rules were given concerning their marriages, for this, as well as for other reasons. But it is not so much as known from which of Noah's sons Melchisedek descended: for he is introduced into the sacred history, as a "priest of the most high God," who had no father, or mother, or genealogy; that he might the more exactly typify that High-Priest, who, as "the Son of man," had no human Father, as "the Son of God" was without mother, and who was appointed to the priesthood without deducing his pedigree from Aaron, or any other predecessor. Moreover, nothing was recorded of Melchisedek respecting the "beginning of his life, or the end of his days," and priesthood: that he might typically resemble "the Son of God," whose existence is from eternity to eternity; and who has had no predecessor, and will have no successor, in his efficacious, meritorious, and perpetual Priesthood. In all these respects the silence of the Scripture being intentional, and referring to the great Antitype, is mentioned in language taken from the instruction to be conveyed, rather than from historical fact; of which learned men have brought instances from other writers of antiquity.

V. 4—10. The argument, arising from the fact, that one of Abraham's contemporaries was in some things superior to him, as here stated, served to introduce with great advantage a most conclusive argument against the perpetual obligation of the Levitical law, and the continuance of the Aaronic priesthood, and that of the covenant made with the nation of Israel at Sinai. (Note, Ex. 19:5.) The apostle, therefore, exhorted the Hebrews to "consider how great" a person their inspired lawgiver had represented Melchisedek to be, not so much in respect of his regal authority, as of his priesthood: when even "the patriarch Abraham," the honoured father of their whole nation, who was not one of Melchisedek's subjects, or in any other way connected with him, owned his superiority, and paid him tithes, as the representative "of the most high God." The Levites indeed were ordered in the law, as the Lord's tribe, "to take tithes of their brethren" the descendants of Abraham, of which the priests had a tenth part for their portion: (Notes, Lev. 27:30—33. Num. 18:21—32.) but Melchisedek, who was not of Abraham's family, received tithes of that patriarch himself. Nay, as "the priest of the most high God," he pronounced a solemn benediction upon him, to whom the promises, concerning the Messiah, and "all nations being blessed in him," were made. Now it was well known, and certain beyond "all contradiction," that the inferior character was to be blessed, in this authoritative manner, by the superior and more honourable; as children by their parents, and the people by the priests. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, 11:20,21. Num. 6:24—27.) So that, some One higher than Abraham, or Aaron, or any mere man of his race, was evidently to be expected, as "a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedek." Under the law indeed, mere sinful dying men took tithes of their brethren; and so one generation after another rose up to receive them: but in the case of Melchisedek, one, concerning whom it was only "witnessed that he liveth," (that is, nothing is said either of his birth or his death,) received tithes of Abraham, as the representative of his posterity; by which it was intimated that a Priest should arise, to whom the whole Israel of God would pay their devoted homage, and from whom they would receive the blessing. So that, "to speak it in a word," the apostle might say, that even Levi, and all the priests descended from him, paid tithes to Melchisedek; "for they were in the loins of their father" and representative, "when Melchisedek met him." This incontestably proved the inferiority of the Levitical priesthood to that of the Messiah; yea, its absolute dependence on him, and subserviency to him.—Indeed, it may be said, that Christ also "was in the loins of Abraham;" but his divine nature, his miraculous and immaculate conception, and his being the intended and predicted Antitype, sufficiently show that he was excepted, as the Seed to whom especially the promises were made.—This argument of the apostle illustrates the nature of our union with Adam, and representation by him, and our participation of the consequences of his apostacy; as well as the method of our recovery by "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven." (Notes, Gen. 2:16,17. 3:17—19. Rom. 5:12—19.)

V. 11—17. If God had designed that the most perfect state of the church on earth, should be "by the Levitical priesthood;" and if complete salvation could have been obtained by that institution, without reference to the priesthood of the Messiah; "what occasion was there for another Priest to arise," and of another order? Or why should the Holy Spirit dictate such a prediction as that above quoted, and raise such an expectation as it was suited to excite? The ten commandments indeed, and many other parts of the law, were given before Aaron was expressly appointed to the priesthood, or mentioned as the intended high-priest, and progenitor of the sacerdotal race: but the Aaronic priesthood was introduced before the legal dispensation received its final confirmation: and the appointment of that priesthood constituted an essential part of it; being so inseparably connected with all its ministrations, that scarcely any part of it could be exactly performed without them. Thus the people "received the law," along with the Aaronic priesthood; and the termination of that priesthood must render the observance of the law impracticable, by necessary consequence. "The change of the priesthood" must imply "a change also of the law;" and the introduction of "a Priest after the order of Melchisedek," must abrogate the ceremonial law, and terminate the legal dispensation. For it had been expressly and repeatedly predicted, that the Messiah should arise from another tribe, even that of Judah; (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Gen. 49:10. Is. 9:6,7. 11:1. Matt. 22:41—46.) and though most of their kings had been of that tribe, yet none of them had ever presumed to officiate at the altar, except Uzziah, who was severely rebuked for his temerity. (Note, 2 Chr. 26:16—23.) The kingdom and the priesthood were thus kept entirely distinct, under the law; while their union in the Person of the Messiah, of the tribe of Judah, was also predicted in the most explicit manner. (Notes, Ps. 110:1—4. Dan. 9:24—27. Zech. 6:12,13.) Indeed, it was evident, and sufficiently proved, tha "our Lord" and Saviour, to whom the apostle called his brethren's attention, was descended from Judah, and of the family of David; (Notes, Matt. 1:1—17. Luke 3:23—38.) of which Moses in the law had said nothing concerning their admission to the priesthood: so that the prediction and its accomplishment concurred in proving, that the Aaronic priesthood and the Mosaic law were abrogated by the coming and Priesthood of the Messiah, and were of no further validity or efficacy.—The prophecy of him, as "a Priest after the order of Melchisedek," made this evident even to a demonstration, yea, more evident than any other argument could do: for this Priest was not constituted after, or according to, the ritual law of Moses, or any of its prescriptions, which were in themselves a carnal commandment relating to mere externals, and incapable of securing spiritual excellency to the appointed high-priests; but he was constituted "according to the power of an endless life." For, though Christ willingly died for the sins of the people, yet that was a part of his priestly office, and he had power to resume his life, and to preserve it for ever; that so he might perpetually execute his office, as the only one to whom it belonged, and who alone was capable of duly performing it, even to the end of the world. V. 18, 19. The prediction before mentioned, and its accomplishment, implied "a disannulling," or abrogation of the preceding commandment, concerning the priesthood, sacrifices, and purifications. And this was expressly intended by the Lord, because they were in themselves "weak and unprofitable;" for, though they had a temporary and typical use and benefit, in respect of the nation of Israel, till the coming of the Messiah, and to believers as means of faith and grace (Notes, 8:3—6. 9:8—10. 10:1—4. Deut. 32:4. John 1:17. Gal. 3:23—25. 4:8—11,21—31.) they had no inherent efficacy to purge the conscience or the affections, and they did not at all profit those who rested in them.—Indeed, the ceremonial "law made nothing perfect," either in the state of the church, or the hearts and consciences of the worshippers; but "the introduction of a better hope," even that of acceptance with God, through the sacrifice and intercession of Christ, brought the church to its highest state of liberty, and its worship to the most entire spirituality, of which its condition in this world admits; and provided most effectually for the complete justification, the inward peace, and the sanctification of all believers. For by that "hope," men are allowed to draw near to God, even to his mercy-seat, with humble boldness; and are not wholly excluded, as the Gentiles during the law; or kept at a great distance, as the Israelites themselves were. (Note, Eph. 2:11—22.)—The concluding words may be rendered, "The bringing in of a better hope is that by which we draw near to God."—The original word signifies more than simply "bringing in;" and implies, that this "better hope" was brought in, even under the old dispensation, by the promises and prophecies of the Messiah, and by the types of the law; though more fully and clearly, when Christ had actually come, and finished his work on earth, and entered into his glory.—"The weakness and unprofitableness of the" ceremonial "law," either to justify or sanctify those who rested in the outward observance of it, and who did not by faith look to the things prefigured by it, was exactly parallel to the Christian sacraments; when the opus operatum, the mere attendance on the 'outward and visible sign,' is depended on, while 'the inward and spiritual grace,' the things signified in them, are disregarded. To such persons they are "weak and unprofitable;" but to believers, they are means of grace, and solemn and acceptable acts of spiritual worship. (Notes, Rom. 2:25—29. 3:1,2.)

V. 20—22. The very great superiority of the Priesthood of the Messiah, to that of Aaron, was evident from another circumstance, to be especially noted in the sacred oracles.

Jehovah appointed the Levitical priesthood "without an oath," by which he showed that the appointment was revocable, and that it would not always continue. But, in constituting the Messiah to be High-Priest, he most solemnly confirmed the appointment with an oath: thus declaring evidently that it was never to be disannulled. (Notes, 6:16—20. Gen. 22:16—18. Num. 14:27—30. Ps. 110:4.) In proportion therefore to this immense difference, it was to be concluded, that Jesus was "the Surety of a better covenant" than that of Aaron.—The word signifies a person who is bound with another for the payment of a debt, or the performance of an engagement. Jesus, "the Surety" of his people, became answerable for their debt of sin, and engaged to satisfy divine justice, and magnify the holy law, as their Representative; (Note, Is. 53:7.) and also to bring them to that repentance, faith, and holiness, which are requisite to their participation of the blessings of his covenant. By entering into this engagement, and fulfilling it in their behalf, he became the Surety of the Father to them, for the performance of all the promises of the covenant; being authorized, and exalted, in human nature, to confer on them all the blessings stipulated in it. The word rendered testament, is commonly translated covenant; its import has been repeatedly considered, and we shall have occasion shortly to speak of it again. (Notes, 9:15—23. Preface to the New Testament.) The better covenant, of which Jesus is the Surety, is not here contrasted with the covenant of works, by which every transgressor is shut up under the curse; but distinguished from the Sinai-covenant with Israel, and the legal dispensation under which the church had so long continued: for the covenant of works had no connexion with the Aaronic priesthood, or the ceremonial law, which exhibited in shadows the blessings of the covenant of grace. (Notes, 8:7—13.) But "the covenant," of which Jesus was Surety, was far better than that of which the high-priests of Israel were typical sureties; and brought the church, and every believer, into far clearer light, more perfect liberty, and more abundant privileges than that could do. The temporary legal covenant with Israel must therefore be abrogated; or, being fulfilled, and having answered the purposes for which it was appointed, it must become invalid: as a lease, when the term of it is expired; or a bond, when it is paid and cancelled. (Note, Col. 2:13—15.) This was requisite, in order that the irrevocable priesthood of Christ, and the better covenant ratified to him, might be openly introduced, and established for the benefit of the nations of the earth. (Notes, 9:18—23. 10:1—18. Ex. 19:5. 24: Eph. 2:14—22.

V. 23—25. The sacred writer next adduced another proof of the superiority of the Messiah's priesthood above that of Aaron. In the Aaronic priesthood, there "were many priests;" because, being sinful, dying men, they were soon removed from their station, and others succeeded them; and the office passing so frequently from one to another, strongly marked its weakness and inefficacy. But the Person of whom the prophet had spoken, and concerning whom the apostle was discoursing, possessed "an unchangeable priesthood," which was never to pass out of his own hands, and never would be liable to interruption or cessation. (Marg. Notes 1—5. 4:14—16.) For, as his death was the appointed sacrifice for the sins of his people; so heaven was the true sanctuary in which his subsequent ministrations were to be performed and there, possessing immortality, he will exercise his priestly office in the most perfect manner, till the consummation of all things. (Notes, 9:24—28.) On which account "he is able," not only by his omnipotence, but in virtue of his priestly character and sacrifice, to save perfectly, to the end, in all possible emergencies and extremities, from all guilt, pollution, and temptation, in all dangers, and against all enemies, every one, and the whole company of those, through all ages and nations, "who come to God," as sinners for salvation, "by him," believing in his name, depending on his atonement and intercession, and asking all blessings for his sake, and as the free gift of God through him. This "he is able" to do, because he is not like a mere man, who undertakes to ing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

26 For [b]such a High-Priest [c]became us, who is [d]holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and [e]made higher than the heavens;

27 Who needeth not [f]daily, as those high-priests, to offer up sacrifice, [g]first for his own sins, [h]and then for the people's: for [i]this he did once, when he offered up himself.

28 For [k]the law maketh men high-priests which have infirmity; but [l]the word of the oath which was since the law, [m]maketh the Son, [n]who is [o]consecrated for evermore.

protect or deliver another, and perhaps dies in the critical season: but he "ever liveth," and reigns "as a Priest, upon his throne," "to make intercession for those who come to God by him;" to plead his merits and sacrifice in their behalf; to present their persons, services, and prayers for acceptance, through the ransom of his blood; to interpose between them, and every one who would lay any thing to their charge; to protect and deliver them by his almighty power, and to give all things to them from his "unsearchable riches." V. 26—28. The considerate inquirer into this most interesting subject, would perceive, that "such a High-Priest" as had been described exactly suited the case of sinners, who were to be restored to the favour and image of a holy God, in a manner consistent with the glory of his name, and peculiarly suited to display that glory; and that he alone could suit it. Such a "High Priest became us," and was proper for us, as was perfectly "holy" in his nature, wholly devoted to God, and full of mercy to men; "harmless," and spotless in his own obedience, that no charge might be brought against him; "undefiled" in his ministrations; "separate," in disposition and conduct, "from the sinners" in whose behalf he was to interpose; and "made higher than the heavens," and all their glorious inhabitants; that the dignity of his Person, and the pre-eminence of his exaltation, might give efficacy to his ministrations, and manifest the justice and holiness of God in saving sinners for his sake, and through his mediation and sacerdotal ministrations. He must be one who had no need to offer any sacrifices for himself, or to offer repeatedly in behalf of others; as the Levitical priests, who were the coadjutors of the high-priest, did daily; and the high-priest did on every return of the great day of expiation. (Notes, Lev. 4:3—12. 9:8—11. 16:6,11—14. Num. 28:2—10.) But such a high-priest could not be found, except Jesus; whose 'one oblation of himself,' being of infinite value, rendered further sacrifices for ever needless. (Notes, 9:24—26. 10:1—10.) For the law made infirm and sinful men high-priests, whose persons and services always needed atonement and forgiveness, and many of whom were men of bad character: "but the word" of the Lord, which he had ratified with an "oath," and which had been spoken, long after the giving of the law, and reached far beyond it, had appointed "the Son" of God to that office, who was in all respects competent to it, as he alone could be; and he was moreover "consecrated" or perfected "to it for evermore." (Note, 5:7—10.) It was therefore evident, that the Levitical priesthood was intended to typify, and prepare the way for that of Christ; which was pre-ordained in due time to supersede and disannul it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. Every part of Scripture was intended, in one way or other, to honour our "King of righteousness and peace," our glorious High-Priest and Saviour: and the more accurately we examine it, the fuller will be our conviction, that "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." (Notes, Luke 24:25—31,44—49. John 5:39—44. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9,10.) May we then learn in simplicity to trust in him, and submit to him, to copy his righteousness, to seek the peace of his kingdom, to devote all that we are and have to his service, and to expect blessings from him alone! May we go forth in our spiritual conflicts, at his word and in his strength; ascribe all our victories to his grace; and desire to be met and blessed by him in all our ways! Patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and angels, own him to be immensely better

CHAPTER VIII.

Further evidence of the superiority of the Messiah's priesthood to that of Aaron, 1—6; and that it was predicted that the Sinai covenant would be abrogated, to make way for a new and better covenant, through a superior Mediator, 7—13.

NOW the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: [a]We have such a High-Priest, [b]who is set on the right hand of the throne of [c]the Majesty in the heavens:

2 A [d]Minister of the sanctuary, and of [e]the true tabernacle, [f]which the Lord pitched, and not man.

3 For [g]every high-priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man [h]have somewhat also to offer.

and greater than they all. Preceding events and dispensations, from the beginning, prepared the way for his appearance, and introduced his royal priesthood. Those institutions, which had divine authority and eminent usefulness for the time, after his coming were "disannulled," "because of the weakness and unprofitableness of them;" for "a better hope" was then introduced, "by which we draw nigh to" our offended "God," and call him, "Abba, Father." (Notes, 10:19—22. Rom. 8:14—17.) No further change shall now take place in the priesthood, or the worship of the church, by any future revelation from God: but he will "overturn, overturn, overturn," the kingdoms of the earth, till that of our Melchisedek be every where established. (Notes, Ez. 17:22—24. 21:25—27. Hag. 2:20—23.) As "the Surety of a far better covenant" than that connected with the Levitical priesthood, he has given his church, and every believer, the greatest advantages for following after perfection. May he stir up the hearts of his ministers and people, and pour out his Spirit, throughout all his church; that spiritual worship and holy obedience may every where abound; and that the congregations and services of his saints on earth may more resemble those of heaven!

V. 19—28. It becomes us to aspire after a degree of spirituality and holiness, as much superior to those of Old Testament believers, as our advantages exceed theirs. No man who knows God, and his holy law of love, and who understands the evil of sin, and the difficulty of saving sinners to the glory of God, could desire the continuance of a priesthood, "according to a carnal commandment;" which appointed those to that office who were themselves sinners, and needed to "offer sacrifices first for their own sins, and then for the people." But now, that the Son of God is made High-Priest, even "such a High-Priest as became us," being "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens;" we may well rejoice that he is "consecrated for evermore," and that he has an unchangeable priesthood. As "he is able to save to the uttermost all who come to God through him;" let the vilest of sinners approach in this way to the mercy-seat of our forgiving God, seeing "he ever liveth to make intercession for them." None need be dismayed, but those who will not "come unto God," or who will not come in the name of his beloved Son: and the case of those will soon become hopeless, how great soever their present presumption may be But, let believers meditate on the power and grace of their great High-Priest, and on his universal and absolute sovereignty; and let them copy his "holy, harmless, and undefiled" conduct, and "his separation from sinners." Then they may confidently expect, that he will "save them to the uttermost," and 'deliver them, in all time of their tribulation, in all time of their wealth, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment.'

NOTES.—CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. The substance, or the summing up, of what had been advanced in the preceding discourse, was this, that Christians had "such a High-Priest" as "became them," and was needful for them: who, having finished his work on earth, had ascended into the heavens and was exalted to pre-eminent dignity and authority, at the right hand of God, in that place where he displays his glorious majesty, and which may be called his "throne.' (Notes, 1:3,4. 4:14—16. 12:2,3. Is. 66:1,2. Acts 7:44—50. Rev. 3:20—22. 4:1—5. 5:5—7. 7:9—17.) Thus Christ was constituted "the Minister" to officiate, in holy things, (Marg.) or "in the most holy place," of which that in the tabernacle had been a type. And in this office he presided over the "true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched" by his almighty power; and which was not constituted by human skill or labour, as the tabernacle in the wilderness had been (Notes, Ex. 31:1—11.)—Some explain "the true tabernacle," of heaven exclusively, as signifying the same with "the sanctuary;" others interpret it of the human nature of Christ in which he "tabernacled" among men, and in which he officiates, as High-Priest, in the holy of holies above: yet as his human nature is needful to constitute his Person as High-Priest, rather than to be the place of his ministrations,

4 For if he were on earth, [h]he should not be a priest, seeing that [i]there are priests that offer gifts according to the law:

5 Who serve unto [k]the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle; for, [l]See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount.

6 But now hath he [m]obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is [n]the Mediator of a better [†]covenant, which was established [o]upon better promises. [Practical Observations.]

7 For if that first covenant [p]had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for a second.

8 For finding fault with them, [q]he saith, Behold, [r]the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make [s]a new [†]covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah:

9 Not according to [u]the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day when [x]I took them by the hand, [y]to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because [z]they continued not in my covenant, and I [a]regarded them not, saith the Lord.

10 For [b]this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; [c]I will [‡]put my laws into their mind, and write them [§]in their hearts: and [d]I will be to them a God, and [e]they shall be to me a people:

11 And [f]they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, [g]Know the Lord: [h]for all shall know me, [i]from the least to the greatest.

12 For [k]I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

13 In that he saith, [l]A new covenant, [m]he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is [n]ready to vanish away.

the figure is harsh. But, as the whole tabernacle comprised the inner and the outer sanctuary; and, as the high-priest alone went into the former, while the other priests officiated in the latter, in subordination to him, whose typical services rendered theirs accepted; and as the tabernacle was an emblem of the whole church of God, though it typified the human nature of Christ also; it seems most obvious, to explain "the true tabernacle," to signify the whole church of the redeemed on earth and in heaven, as one by its union with Christ Jesus: for believers, separately and collectively, "are the habitation of God through the Spirit." (Notes, Ex. 26:7—29. P. O. Note, Eph. 2:19—22.) Christ ministers personally in the holy place above, as sole High-Priest; he presides over the whole true tabernacle, and so the prayers and services of the spiritual priesthood, on earth, are rendered acceptable and efficacious, through his meritorious intercession in heaven. (Note, Luke 1:8—10.)

V. 3—6. As "every high-priest," according to the law, was appointed to "offer gifts and sacrifices," that is, sin-offerings, burnt-offerings, and voluntary oblations; (Note, 5:1—4.) so it was requisite that this Person, even the Messiah, should have somewhat to offer, that the Antitype might correspond with the type: and indeed for still far more cogent reasons. He therefore assumed human nature, appeared on earth, and there "gave himself a Sacrifice to God for the sins of his people." (Notes, 2:14,15. 10:5—10.) Having accomplished this, (Note, John 19:28—30.) he ascended into heaven to appear before God, as with the blood of the sacrifice, in their behalf: all which exactly corresponded to the method prescribed to the high-priest on the great day of expiation. (Notes, Lev. 16:) It was indeed not proper for him to continue on earth, after he had offered his one all-sufficient sacrifice: for in that case, he "would not have been a priest;" seeing, in respect of the legal services, "there were priests" appointed to perform them. Christ, not being of the priestly tribe, could not properly have interfered in them; and heaven was the appointed "sanctuary," in which he must perform the remainder of his meritorious and efficacious ministrations; being the true holy of holies, the place in which JEHOVAH displays his glory, and dispenses his blessings from the mercy-seat. (Notes, Ex. 25:10—22.) The priests indeed, who offered sacrifices in the earthly sanctuary, ministered in the worship of God after a ritual, which was formed to be "an exemplar and shadow of heavenly things." This had been intimated to Moses, when he was charged to form every thing relative to the tabernacle according to the exact "pattern shown to him in the mount." (Note, Ex. 25:40.)—(Note, Acts 7:44—50.)—The various particulars respecting Christ and his salvation, which were typified by the tabernacle, its furniture, and worship, have already been explained. (Notes, Ex. 25:—31:)—Instead of interfering with the priests in the typical services of the temple, Christ "had obtained a more excellent ministry," of real value and efficacy, in the heavenly sanctuary; in which he was as much superior to the priests after the order of Aaron, as the covenant, of which he was the Mediator, was "a better covenant," founded and established "on better promises," than the Sinai covenant with Israel.—It has repeatedly been observed, that all unbelievers continued personally under 'the covenant of works;' and that believers were personally interested in 'the covenant of grace,' by faith in the Messiah who was to come. (Note, Ex. 19:5.) The Mosaic dispensation contained in it a typical gospel, and its ordinances were to believers' means of grace,' as well as acts of worship. But the covenant here referred to was that made with Israel as a nation, securing the possession of Canaan, and various temporal benefits to them, on prescribed conditions: and the promises of all spiritual blessings, and of eternal life, to believers of all nations, and through all succeeding ages, which were openly revealed by the gospel, and ratified through Christ, are of infinitely greater value than any temporal advantages to a single nation could be.—See, &c. (5) The quotation is not exactly according to the Septuagint, but gives the sense of the Hebrew.

V. 7—13. The Hebrews might indisputably learn from their own prophets, if they duly attended to them, that their national covenant, and the legal dispensation, were not intended to be perpetual. For if that covenant had been free from defect, and suited to bring the church to the highest state of perfection, to which it was to be advanced on earth, there would have been no place for a second covenant, or occasion of proposing any plans for it; as the Lord never changes his methods without reason. The Mosaic law indeed, and the Sinai covenant, were well suited to introduce the promised Messiah, and the gospel dispensation, and to form, as it were, a proper scaffolding for that magnificent edifice: (Note, Deut. 32:4.) yet they did not secure the sanctification and salvation of the people; nor did they even prevent such national apostacies, as were a forfeiture of all their privileges. About the time of the Babylonish captivity, therefore, the Lord, by his prophet Jeremiah, reproved the nation of Israel for their violations of his covenant, and promised to "make a new covenant" with his people; "putting his laws into their minds, and writing them in their hearts." (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 10:11—18. 11:17—19. John 6:41—46. 2 Cor. 3:1—11.) The passage quoted has already been fully explained, and a few hints must here suffice. (Note, Jer. 31:31—34.) The words, translated from the Hebrew, "Although I was a Husband unto them," are here rendered, as given from the Septuagint, "And I regarded them not." From this one clause, as it appears to me, the whole passage is generally spoken of by some learned men, as quoted from the Septuagint; but it varies from that version in several immaterial particulars, and, except in the above clause, it accords to the Hebrew.—This prophecy was fulfilled in the conversion of multitudes of Judah and Israel, in the primitive times of the gospel, and it foretells the future conversion and restoration of that people: but it is also fulfilled to all the spiritual Israel, who are really "a holy nation," as Israel according to the flesh was relatively. And as it can be said of no other company, that they "all know the LORD:" it must be meant of them especially. The repentance, faith, divine and efficacious teaching, and the sanctification of the chosen people of God, as well as the complete and final forgiveness of all their sins, how many and great soever, so that they should never more be remembered against them, were provided for, in the "better promises of this new covenant:" and thus their holy obedience, their final perseverance, and their eternal salvation were secured. The apostle, therefore, inferred conclusively from this prediction, that the promise of a new covenant had in effect "made the first old," or antiquated; and this was as much as to say, that

The tabernacle and its furniture, and the typical meaning of it, and of the ordinances observed at it, 1—10. An application of the subject to the Priesthood, Sacrifice, and covenant of Christ, 11—28. Men are appointed to die and after death the judgment: when Christ shall come for salvation to all who look for him, 27, 28.

THEN verily, [a]the first covenant [b]had also [c]ordinances of divine service, [d]and a worldly sanctuary.

2 For there was [d]a tabernacle made; [e]the first, wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the show-bread; which is called [f]the sanctuary:

5 And [n]over it the cherubims of glory shadowing [o]the mercy-seat; of which we cannot now speak particularly.

6 Now when these things were thus ordained, [p]the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God:

7 But [q]into the second went the high-priest alone, once every year, [r]not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the [s]errors of the people:

8 The [t]Holy Ghost thus signifying, that [u]the way unto the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing:

9 Which was [x]a figure for [y]the time then present, in which were offered both [z]gifts and sacrifices, [a]that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience;

10 Which stood only [b]in meats and drinks, and [c]divers washings, and [d]carnal [‡]ordinances, imposed on them [e]until the time of reformation.

it was "decaying, and about to vanish away." So that the abolition of the national covenant made with Israel, and the abrogation of the Mosaic law, would have been expected by the Jews, at the coming of the Messiah, according to their own prophets, if they had not erred from ignorance of the Scriptures. (Notes, 7:1—22.)—It is undeniable, that the national covenant with Israel at Sinai, and not the 'covenant of works,' with men in general, or the Abrahamic covenant, is spoken of.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. While we bless God, that of his plenteous mercy he has provided for us ruined sinners, "such a High-Priest," as suited our helpless condition; that he has accepted his one oblation of himself; that he has exalted him to "the right hand of his Majesty in the heavens," to be "a Minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle;" and that he has made a better covenant with him, in behalf of his true people, and with them through him, and established it on better promises, than those given to Israel; let us see to it, that we draw nigh to him in this appointed way, as spiritual worshippers, in humble faith, and submission to his righteousness, relying on his mercy and truth, and praying for all his promised blessings.—If it were dangerous for those, who had "the example and shadow of heavenly things," to deviate in the least from the divine prescriptions; how can they escape condemnation, who have the clear discovery of the heavenly things themselves, yet worship other mediators, prefer human traditions, come to God in their own name, as if righteous persons, or refuse to come at all, as if independent of him, under no obligations to him, and sufficient for their own felicity?—In every part of our worship and obedience, we should keep close to the only and perfect standard of Scripture, and every deviation must be proportionably injurious: but mistakes, in the way of a sinner's access and acceptance, cannot but prove fatal in the end, if not previously discovered and rectified. (Notes, Rom. 9:24—29. 10:1—4. Gal. 1:6—10. 5:1—6.)

V. 7—13. We should often inquire, whether "the new covenant" be really sealed and ratified to us: for, though the gospel dispensation is "faultless;" and though the Lord has, as it were, "taken us by the hand" to lead us forth from Pagan and antichristian idolatry; yet he will have no special "regard to us" at last, unless he now "put his laws into our minds and write them in our hearts," as the principle of genuine repentance and willing obedience; unless we expect our happiness from him as our God, and worship him spiritually as his people; and unless we are taught by his Holy Spirit, to know him in such a manner, as uprightly to fear, love, trust, and obey him. (Notes, 1 Chr. 22:6—10. John 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6. 1 John 2:3—6.) Thus all true Israelites, "from the least to the greatest," are "taught of God," and sealed as his people; and thus they are become satisfied, that he "hath been merciful to their sins, and will remember their iniquities no more." This "righteousness shall be for ever, this salvation shall not be abolished," and the blessings of this irrevocable covenant will be the eternal portion of every true believer. But all other things, whether they be worldly vanities, external privileges, or forms and notions of religion, will soon "decay, wax old, vanish away," and leave those who have trusted in them most miserable for evermore. (Notes, 1:10—12. 2 Pet. 3:5—13.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1—5. The apostle, knowing the excessive and dangerous attachment of the Hebrews to the legal ceremonies, proceeded more particularly to show their typical reference to Christ. "The first covenant" had indeed "ordinances of divine worship," the observance of which constituted a considerable part of the legal righteousness of Israel as a nation: and it had "a worldly sanctuary," built of such materials, and decorated with such magnificence, as this present world affords, and as carnal men admire. For Moses, at God's command, caused the tabernacle to be erected, which, besides the courts and the porch, consisted of two parts; in the first division, called "the holy place" or the sanctuary, were the candlestick, the table, and the show bread; and within the second veil, in the holiest of all, was the ark, and the other things here mentioned. (Notes, Ex. 16:32—34. 25:—27: 40:17—33. Num. 17:2—11.) "The golden censer," on which the high-priest burned incense, within the veil, on the day of expiation, seems to have been left in the most holy place during the rest of the year. "The rod of Aaron and the golden pot that had manna," were within "the holy of holies," and by or near the ark, as the word may be rendered; but they seem not to have been put within it. (Note, 1 Kings 8:7—9.)—The typical import of all these things has been shown: and it is not necessary to speak of them particularly in this place, even as it was not for the apostle. "The golden altar of incense" is not mentioned in this catalogue; for what reason we know not: but the conjecture of some expositors, that the words rendered "the golden censer," meant that altar, is groundless: for that was stationary in the first sanctuary, and was not used by the high-priest on the day of atonement, who burned incense on a portable censer within the veil. (Note, Lev. 16:11—14.)—The first. (1) Many copies add σκηνη, tabernacle: but it appears to me, that some transcriber erroneously inserted that word, to supply the ellipsis: and that our version more properly substitutes covenant, as directly connected with the preceding verse. (8:13.)

Ordinances. (1) Δικαιωματα. Luke 1:6. Rom. 1:32. 2:26. 5:16,18. 8:4. Rev. 15:4. It is used in different senses; but ritual observances seems the meaning here. (Note, Luke 1:5—7.) The holiest of all. (3) Αγια αγιων, holy of holies. (Note, Ex. 26:31—33.)

V. 6, 7. When all the particulars, above mentioned, had been prepared, according to God's appointment; the ordinary priest performed the several parts of their office in "the first sanctuary," at all times, without further limitation. But "the high-priest alone" was allowed to go into the most holy place; nay, he was not allowed to enter thither more than once, or on one day, in the year; nor even on that day, till he had offered sacrifices for his own transgressions, and those of the nation; and then he took the blood of the sin-offering within the veil, to sprinkle before the mercy-seat. (Notes, Lev. 16:) Thus out of Israel, that holy nation, one holy tribe was selected; of that tribe, one holy family; and of that family, one person to be "holiness to the LORD:" yet even this person, so carefully selected from the whole race of men, might not approach God "on a mercy seat," without atoning blood, and only one day in a year; on pain of death for his presumption, if he transgressed these rules!—Some commentators mention carrying the blood of the sacrifices in general, into the temple, to sprinkle it before the veil, as one of the services performed by the ordinary priests: but it is evident that no blood was carried into the tabernacle, except that of sin-offerings for the high-priest or for the congregation; and this was done by this high-priest himself. In other cases, when some of the blood had been sprinkled about the altar of burnt-offering; the residue was poured out at the bottom of it. (Notes, 13:9—14. Lev. 1:5—9. 4:4—7,22—35. 6:30. 16: 11—19.)

presumptuous sins which were punished by death. (Notes, Lev. 4: 5: 6:2—7. Ps. 19:12—14.)

V. 8—10. By all those restrictions and limitations, which kept even the worshippers of JEHOVAH at so awful a distance, "the Holy Spirit," by whose inspiration they were revealed and recorded, conveyed this important instruction; namely, that "the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest." (Note, 1—5.) This instruction was constantly inculcated, as long as the "first tabernacle was standing," and the ceremonies of that worship continued in force. For the temple, being formed after the pattern of the tabernacle made by Moses, and having the same ministrations performed at it, might be considered as the continuation of it; and "the first tabernacle," is here distinguished from that "greater and more perfect tabernacle," afterwards mentioned. (11,12) So that the holy places, in which the priests of Aaron's family ministered till the coming of Christ, are evidently meant.—A few believers indeed, under the divine teaching, discerned something in these rites concerning the way of access to God, of communion with him, and of admission into heaven, through the promised Redeemer: but the Israelites in general looked no further than the external forms; and scarcely any person conceived an idea, that sinners of every nation should have that freedom and boldness of access to God through Christ, and all the privileges and hopes, which believers enjoy under the Christian dispensation. The difficulty of guilty polluted rebels being thus admitted into the presence and favour of a holy God, was fully declared by those appointments: but the sacrifice and priesthood of the incarnate Son of God at once disannulled them all. When he hung upon the cross, the veil of the temple was rent. (Notes, Matt. 27:51—53.) His ascension into heaven, and intercession there, opened the way to the mercy-seat, by his doctrine "the way into the holiest was made manifest;" and thenceforth it was only necessary, that sinners should be made willing by regenerating grace, to avail themselves of such an invaluable privilege. (Note, 10:19—22.) The legal ordinances, therefore, especially those of the great day of atonement, were figures "for the time then present;" (or, as some render it, of the present time, the happy period thus prefigured being at length arrived;) in which were offered various gifts and sacrifices, that could not give the worshippers genuine solid peace of conscience, or make a perfect reconciliation between the sinner and the offended Judge. The offerers who rested in them, and did not by faith rely on the promised Saviour, could not obtain forgiveness of sins, or spiritual blessings; but were only exempted from temporal punishment, and admitted to external privileges, as members of the kingdom and church of Israel, which was in a peculiar sense under the government of JEHOVAH. (Note, 11—14.) The other ordinances of that covenant, which were connected with its sacrifices, consisted principally of regulations concerning meats and drinks, the latter especially in respect of the priests, and the Nazarites; and divers baptisms, or washings with water, or in water as typical of sanctification, and such like institutions which were carnal in themselves; though for wise purposes they were "imposed" till the coming of the Messiah, which was to be a time of reformation, by the introduction of a more simple and spiritual worship. (Note, John 4:21—24.) They could therefore be of no use to those Jews, who rejected Christ out of zeal for them, and it was absurd for the Hebrew Christians to adhere so pertinaciously to them.—The Holy Ghost, &c. (8) This is a most express attestation to the divine inspiration of Moses, which should not pass without special notice, in these days of skepticism on that subject.

Standing. (8) Σχουσης στασιν, retained its station. The temple which succeeded to the tabernacle, and must be included in all this argument along with it, was standing when the apostle wrote: but after the introduction of the gospel, it virtually lost its station and use, in true religion.—A figure. (9) Παραβολη. 11:19. Matt. 13:34.—Make perfect.] Τελειωσαι. 7:19. 11:40. V. 11—14. After long expectation, the promised Redeemer was at length come, to be "a High-Priest" capable of procuring and bestowing, all over the earth, without distinction and to future ages, and to all eternity, the blessings of salvation on all believers: and of fulfilling to them all the ancient promises of God. This he was appointed to do, by officiating as "a High-Priest, in a greater and more perfect tabernacle," than that prepared by Moses, and even than the temple built by Solomon, or any made with hands: "that is to say," in one, not builded after the manner of men, or even like the lower creation; being the contrivance of infinite wisdom, and the work of almighty power. This may be explained, either of his holy human nature, in which he tabernacled on earth, and officiates as Priest in heaven; (Note, John 1:14.) or rather of the heavens themselves, where "he appears in the presence of God for us." (Note, 24—26.) Nor did he make atonement for sin, "by the blood of goats or calves," and enter into the most holy place with it; but, having shed his own most precious blood on earth, as in the court of the sanctuary, "he entered in, once for all," into the true holy place in heaven, to plead the merit of it before the Father's throne, as the complete expiation of all the sins of his people; having thus "obtained eternal redemption" for them, from wrath, and sin, and all its consequences; and being assured, that no further atonement would ever be required in their behalf. (Notes, 10:1—10.) "For if the blood of bulls and goats," and other irrational creatures, could avail to expiate the guilt of the nation, or of individuals, on the day of atonement, or on other occasions; (Notes, Lev. 4: 16:) and if "the ashes of a heifer" mixed with water, and sprinkling those who were unclean through the touch of a dead body, could produce a typical external sanctity, by which they might be admitted into the congregation of the Lord; (Notes, Num 19:) how much more efficacy might be supposed in the blood of Christ, actually to remove guilt and defilement! His divine nature, the entire purity of his human nature, the exalted dignity of his person, as EMMANUEL; the honour put on the law of God by his most perfect obedience; and the voluntary offering of himself, under the immediate influences of "the eternal Spirit," as a spotless sacrifice to divine justice in the stead of sinners, concurred to render it glorious in God, for his sake, fully to pardon, and freely to accept, all who were interested in him by faith. If then, there was the least efficacy in external expiations and purifications, through the appointment of God, and because they showed the guilt and pollution of sin, and typified the method of its removal, so that it became proper for God through them to confer temporal benefits on criminals; how much more efficacious must the blood of Christ be, "to purge the believer's conscience from dead works," from the guilt of those evil works, which were committed by such as were dead in sin, and deserved death; or which really and deeply polluted the soul, even as the touch of a dead corpse ritually did the body! As, therefore, it was abundantly suited to render the exercise of mercy consistent with the most perfect justice and holiness, and honourable to God to accept the services of sinners who believed: so, when apprehended by faith, it effectually removes the burden of guilt from the conscience, and gave the trembling sinner peace, confidence, and comfort, in approaching, worshipping, and obeying the living God. Christians therefore could have no occasion to cleave to the abrogated typical expiations of the Mosaic law.—Some expositors, by "the eternal Spirit," suppose the Deity of the Son to be meant: but this seems rather to be implied in the word CHRIST. The holiness and obedience of our Saviour, his miraculous powers, and the supports given to his human nature, are constantly ascribed to the Holy Spirit, "with which he was anointed without measure," sealing his appointment to his mediatorial offices; and as he was carried through his last scene of sufferings, by his most perfect zeal and love, which also gave value to his sacrifice. (Notes, 1:8,9. Ps. 45:6,7. Is. 11:2—5. 42:1—4. 59:20,21. 61: 1—3. Matt. 3:16,17. John 3:27—36. Acts 1:1—3. 10:36—43.) The Holy Spirit therefore seems to be intended, whose eternal Deity (as well as the everlasting value and efficacy of Christ's atonement) is attested by the epithet here employed. The Levitical services were all "shadows of heavenly things:" the expiations were, therefore, types of some real expiation. 'Now what expiation is there in the whole universe, if the Sacrifice of Christ is excluded?' Macknight.

Eternal redemption. (12) Αιωνιαν λυτρωσιν. Luke 1:68. 2:38. The word is sometimes used for temporal deliverances from bondage or captivity; but the redemption which Christ effected is distinguished as "eternal redemption.

15 And for this cause he is [c]the Mediator of [d]the New Testament, that by [e]means of death, [b]for the redemption of the transgressions that were under [i]the first testament, [k]they which are called might receive the [l]promise of [m]eternal inheritance.

16 For where a testament is, there must also of necessity [n]be the death of the testator.

17 For [o]a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth.

18 Whereupon neither [c]the first testament was [p]dedicated without blood.

20 Saying, [t]This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you.

21 Moreover, [u]he sprinkled likewise with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry.

22 And [x]almost all things are by the law purged with blood; [y]and without shedding of blood is no remission.

23 It was therefore necessary that [z]the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but [a]the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.

24 For Christ is not entered into [b]the holy places made with hands, which are [c]the figures of the true; [d]but into heaven itself, now [e]to appear in the presence of God for us:

V. 15—17. Because of the unceasing and inexhaustible efficacy of his sacrifice, Christ was appointed to be "the Mediator of the new covenant." He had undertaken the cause of sinners, which must otherwise have been relinquished as desperate; as he alone was capable of offering a sacrifice of sufficient value, to make a real atonement: and he had come into the world, in human nature, for that purpose; in order by means of his death, to pay a ransom to God for the transgressions, which had been committed by believers, under the old covenant, or the legal dispensation; even those who lived before his coming, as well as all others who were called by the grace of God to faith in him, "might receive the promise of eternal inheritance." (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26.) For the temporal inheritance alone was secured to the Israelites, by their observance of the legal expiations; and those of them, who sought and obtained spiritual and eternal blessings, were made partakers of them through the anticipated efficacy of Christ's redemption. That grace was finally confirmed to them by his death: so that, in this respect, the covenant he mediated might also be considered as a Testament, by which a man bequeaths certain legacies to persons specified in it, to be given to them in consequence of his death. Thus Christ might be considered, as having acquired, in his mediatorial office, a conditional right to dispose of spiritual and eternal blessings, as by his will and Testament. These he bequeathed to all such as should apply for them by faith: and though, as a special favour, some were, before his coming, made partakers of them, in consequence of his unfailing engagements to assume human nature, and make redemption for their transgressions; yet even their right was incomplete till after his death, and all others must be admitted to claim them on that ground only. For when "a Testament is made," "the death of the testator must" of necessity take place, before the legacies can be claimed. It is of no validity till he be dead; for, as he may change it at pleasure while he lives, it has no force till afterwards. Thus Christ died, not only to obtain the blessings of salvation for us; but to give efficacy to his testamentary disposal of them: though he is different from all other testators, in that he rose again, and ever liveth to be the Executor of his own testament, for the benefit of all who are interested in it.—Thus the passage has generally been interpreted: but this is the only place, in which the original word is expressly used in Scripture for a testament, or the will of a dying person. The change of the meaning also, from covenant to testament, seems unprecedented: "the Mediator of a testament," and "the blood of a testament," are expressions, to which it is difficult to annex any precise ideas; and the Sinai covenant can hardly in any sense be called "a testament." Several modern expositors have therefore endeavoured to establish another interpretation.—'For this reason, ... of the new covenant he is the Mediator, or High-Priest, by whom its blessings are dispensed, and also the Sacrifice, by which it is procured and ratified; that, his death being accomplished, for obtaining the pardon of the transgressions of the first covenant, believers of all ages and nations, as the called seed of Abraham, ... may receive the promised eternal inheritance. For '... where a covenant is made by sacrifice, there is a necessity, that the death of the appointed sacrifice be produced. For, according to the practice of God and man, a covenant is made firm over dead sacrifices; seeing it never hath force, whilst the goat, calf, or bullock, appointed as the sacrifice of ratification, liveth. Because from the beginning, God ratified his covenants by sacrifice, to preserve among men the expectation of the Sacrifice of his Son; hence not even the covenant at Sinai was made without sacrifice.' Macknight. (Notes, 18—23. Gen. 15:7—21. Jer. 34:18,19.)—It appears to me, that the original will admit of this interpretation; but the nature of this work does not allow of my enlarging on the criticisms by which it is supported. On the one hand, the cavils, which have been raised against the apostle's reasoning as inconclusive, if the first interpretation be adopted; and on the other hand, the venerable names, which have sanctioned it, with other circumstances of a similar nature, render me afraid of too confidently preferring either interpretation. I cannot, however, on the whole, but think that the latter exposition is the most obvious and consonant to the apostle's general way of reasoning.

V. 18—23. To prefigure the necessity of the blood-shedding of Christ, even the Sinai covenant had not been dedicated, or ratified, without blood. For after the law of the ten commandments had been delivered from the mount, and "Moses had spoken every precept to the people, according to" the outlines of that "law," on which their national covenant was established, and they had consented to it; he wrote them in a book, and proceeded to the solemn ratification of the covenant, as a typical mediator between God and the nation. (Notes, Ex. 24:1—11.)—The apostle specified some particulars, which are not found in the history; probably taking them from the usages of his people, on some occasions. To prevent the blood from coagulating, it was customary to mix it with water, that it might sprinkle the better, (which was an apt emblem of the twofold benefit of Christ's atonement;) and then putting "scarlet wool" upon a stalk of "hyssop," they sprinkled the blood with it. (Notes, Lev. 14:4—7. Ps. 51:7.)—The Hebrews also knew, that Moses had afterwards sprinkled the tabernacle and all its furniture with blood, to consecrate them for the worship of God. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, 8—10. Lev. 16:18—22.) In short, it was a general rule, that "almost every thing was by the law purified with blood;" which showed, that nothing could be clean to a sinner, not even his religious duties, except as his guilt was expiated by the death of a sacrifice of sufficient value for that end, and unless he continually depended on it. And indeed it was absolutely a universal rule, that "without the shedding of blood," no kind or degree of sin was ever pardoned, or the punishment due to it remitted. (Note, 10:3,4.) It was then necessary by the appointment of the law, that the "patterns," exemplars, or types of heavenly things should be purified by the sacrifice of innocent animals, and by the application of their blood; or they could not be acceptably used in the worship of God: but it was also necessary for more durable and immutable reasons, that "the heavenly things themselves should be purified by better sacrifices than these," or, by an expiation of superior excellence, even by the One sacrifice of the death of Christ, which was infinitely more valuable than all of them. In order to his efficaciously interceding for sinners in heaven, and opening for them the way to the mercy-seat; that they might commune with their reconciled Father in his ordinances, and at length be admitted into heaven: it was indispensably necessary that Christ should on earth, in our nature shed his blood, and die a Sacrifice on the cross, that he might have the infinite merit of that Sacrifice to plead before the throne, in behalf of all who should "come unto God by him:" otherwise mercy, shown to sinners, would dishonour the justice and holiness of God, and their admission into heaven would, as it were, defile that holy place. (Note 6:16—20. 10:1—4.)—This, &c. (20) The quotation is not

V. 24—26. Christ had "not entered into the holy places," made by the hands of men, in order to be "the figures of the true," for which the blood of animals might be a suitable consecration: but he had entered "into heaven itself," to appear in the immediate presence of God, as the Advocate for rebels and enemies, and in order to procure them full pardon, abundant grace, and eternal life; and a sacrifice of proportionably superior value was necessary, that he might perform this ministration, to the glory of God, and the salvation of all who believed in him. (Notes, 4:14—16. 1 John 2:1,2.) This had been provided in "the sacrifice of himself:" and there was no need that he should repeat his atoning sufferings and death; after the manner of the high-priest, who "every year" went into the holy place with the blood of others, even of the animals slain for sin-offerings: for in that case Christ "must often have suffered," since the first entrance of sin, soon after the foundation of the world, when the efficacy of his gracious interposition in behalf of sinners began. (Note, Gen. 3:14, 15.) This indeed he must have done, if the sacrifice had been of small, or even of finite value: as it would have been if he had been a mere man, or a mere creature. But, on the contrary, the intrinsic and infinite value of his sacrifice appeared, in that, after he had been predicted and promised for four thousand years, and sinners had all along been saved by faith in him; he at length appeared in human nature, once, in the last period of the world when the concluding dispensation was to be introduced: that, by the one "sacrifice of himself," he might make an all-sufficient expiation of sin; and both provide for the full pardon of all the sins of the numberless multitudes of believers, through every age and nation; and also for the destruction of sin out of their hearts and nature, by their progressive sanctification: that so they might be made as righteous, holy, and happy, as if they never had been sinners. So immense was the value and efficacy of his one oblation! (Notes, Rom. 5:12—21.)

V. 27, 28. By the sentence denounced on the human race in Adam, "the surety of the covenant of works," it had been "appointed for men once to die," from which Enoch and Elijah alone had been excepted. It was also "appointed" to all men, without one exception, that after death they must appear in judgment before God, and receive an eternal recompense of their conduct during their lives on earth; which judgment must be unto condemnation to all sinners, who have not previously obtained a pardon. And as, "without shedding of blood there is no remission" of sins, nor could the legal sacrifices really atone for them; so Christ, "the second Adam," the Surety of his people, had once offered himself, "to bear the sins of many," even of all the multitudes who ever did or ever shall believe in him; that thus he might fully expiate them, and make way for their entire pardon and complete salvation. So that, though they are not exempted from the stroke of death; they are delivered from the penalty, the sting, and the consequences of death: (Note, 1 Cor. 15:55—58.) and they will at length be made conquerors over that terrible enemy, and thus be justified in Christ at the day of judgment, and inherit eternal life through him. He therefore, having effectually accomplished his work of making atonement for sin, needed not to appear on earth again, "in the likeness of sinful flesh," to be "numbered with transgressors," and be "made sin for us:" but he will at last "appear" in another form, in all his mediatorial and personal glory, as the omnipotent, omniscient, and righteous Judge of the world; in order to complete the salvation of all those who believe in him, "look for him," wait for his coming, and prepare to meet him, by faith, hope, love, and patient obedience. "the scape-goat bare," or carried away, the sins of the people into the wilderness; and the high-priest, when he had entered into the holy of holies, in linen garments, came forth to the people in his splendid sacerdotal robes to pronounce the blessing upon them. (Notes, Lev. 16:20—25.)—"Did he not appear the first time without sin? Yes certainly, as to any inherent guilt; for the Scripture says, "He had no sin." What then is the meaning of this opposition, that at his first coming "he bare our sins," but at his second coming "he shall appear without sin unto salvation?" These words can have no other imaginable sense but this, that at his first coming he sustained the person of a sinner, and suffered instead of us: but his second coming shall be on another account, and he shall appear, not as a Sacrifice, but as a Judge.' Abp. Tillotson.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. "The ordinances of divine service, and the worldly sanctuary" of the Mosaic covenant, point out to us Christ as the Light of the church and of the world, and "the Bread of life" to our souls; (Notes, John 1:4—9. 6:30—35,47—58. P. O. 30—35,47—59.) and remind us of his divine Person, his fruitful Priesthood which flourishes for ever, his perfect righteousness, and his all-prevailing intercession; "which things the angels desire to look into" with admiring praise and adoration.—At what a distance has sin placed us from our holy Creator; when all the preparatory sacrifices of the law still left the worshippers secluded, and in a sense banished, even from the presence of God on his mercy-seat! All these sacrifices and services could no more purge the guilty conscience, than distinctions in meats, and divers "baptisms" could cleanse the polluted heart, or new create the fallen nature of man. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," that "the Way into the holiest" is now manifested, by the coming, sacrifice, and ascension of our great High-Priest! Now we "sinners of the Gentiles" may come with far more "boldness to the throne of grace" than Israel's pontiff himself could: and now the gate of heaven is thrown open to all believers. Eternal redemption, and the promise of eternal inheritance, are purchased for us by "the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God." This effectually purges the most guilty "conscience from dead works to serve the living God;" whilst the grace, which seals the pardon, new creates the polluted soul. May we then be made "partakers of this heavenly calling," and seek remission of our sins, only through the shedding and sprinkling of "the blood of the New Testament," which God has enjoined unto us! (Note, 13:20,21.)

V. 15—28. We must never presume to approach God, except upon a mercy-seat, and in the name of our great High-Priest, who is "entered into heaven to appear in his presence for us." All our hopes and blessings must be sought as the fruit of the agonizing, yet voluntary death of our gracious Saviour, the legacy of his dying love, and the gift of his royal munificence to rebellious creatures. We must ascribe even our sanctification, and all our real good works, to the same all-procuring cause; and attend on divine ordinances, and offer our spiritual sacrifices, as "sprinkled with his blood," and so purified from their defilement. Nay, we must expect admission into heaven, as the place which he has prepared for us, through the presenting of his blood, for the ransom of our souls, and the purchase of our inheritance; which would otherwise have been contaminated by our entrance into it. Thus we should in all things learn the inestimable value of the "one sacrifice," which Christ once appeared on earth to offer for us; that we may know our interest in his covenant, and be "constrained by his love" to the most devoted and unreserved obedience. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) In this manner we shall be reconciled to the appointed stroke of death, and look forward to judgment with cheerful hope; and so wait prepared for his coming the second "time without sin" to perfect our salvation. But as no wisdom, learning, virtue, wealth, reputation, or authority, can exempt one of our race from the sentence of death, and as no man can redeem his brother from death; (Note, Ps. 49:6—9.) so nothing can deliver a sinner from condemnation at the day of judgment, except an interest in the atoning sacrifice of Christ; nor will one be saved from eternal punishment, who has despised, refused, or neglected this great salvation. For though, in the concerns of this world, the criminal suffers many painful effects of his offences, previous to his trial; yet the sentence of the law is not executed, nor the threatened vengeance inflicted, till he has been arraigned, convicted, and condemned at the appointed tribunal.

NOTES.—CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. As the Hebrews would be extremely backward in acceding to the apostle's conclusions, concerning the inefficacy of the legal expiations; he proceeded still further to argue with them on that important subject. He observed, that the ceremonial law had only a "shadow of the good things to come" to the church by the Messiah, and not so much as "the very image of them." Its ordinances rather resembled, faintly and obscurely, the way of salvation through Christ, and the several blessings conferred on believers through him, as a shadow, or the sketch and outline of a picture, resembles a man; than gave a lively or adequate idea of them, as the reflection in a mirror, a good portrait, or statue, does of the person thus represented. The sacrifices therefore, which were constantly offered, "every year," on the great day of atonement, could not make the very persons, who came into the courts of the temple on that solemn occasion, free from the guilt of their offences, or accepted with God. He was pleased, indeed, to exempt Israel from punishment, and to continue to the nation their external benefits, while they adhered to the prescribed worship; but they, who were actually pardoned and saved, received those blessings by faith in the promised Messiah. (Notes, 7:18,19. 9:8—10. 11:39,40.) This must be allowed to have been the case: for if the sacrifices could have completely atoned for the sins of the people, would they not have been discontinued, as no further necessary? The worshippers, having been once purged from their guilt, would have no more been burdened with such a conscience of sins, as required more and further sacrifices to take it away. This is the privilege of Christians: for the sacrifice of Christ, being of intrinsic and infinite value and efficacy, there is no occasion that it should be repeated: but believers, having once had "their consciences purged from dead works by faith in his blood," are perfectly justified and accepted unto eternal life. (Note, 9:11—14.) Thenceforth they seek no other sacrifice; they are no more brought under condemnation; they continually apply, in the exercise of penitent faith, the unfailing efficacy of that one all-sufficient atonement to their consciences; and thus they preserve inward peace, connected with humiliation and tenderness of conscience, notwithstanding the remains of sin in their hearts, and the guilt which they thence contract in their daily conduct.—"Would they not, &c." (2) Some render this, "They would not have ceased to be offered." That is, they would have continued to be offered, being efficacious and adequate. But it is plain, from the apostle's previous reasoning on several things contained in the Old Testament, that this was never intended. The reading with an interrogation seems to be founded on the best authority, and is most satisfactory.—If any sacrifice had been offered, of sufficient efficacy to atone for sin, there would have been no need for a continual repetition of it; and that repetition showed the inefficacy of the most solemn legal sacrifices. On the contrary, when the one sacrifice of Christ had been offered, the legal sacrifices were virtually abolished; no other sacrifice was required; no repetition was necessary; the end was fully answered; nothing, except faith in him, was needful; and the appointed ordinances were no longer prefigurations, but memorials, of his one all-sufficient atonement.

Shadow. (1) Σκιαν. 8:5. Col. 2:17.—Image.] Εικονα. See on Rom. 1:23.

V. 3, 4. The apostle's argument implied, that no sacrifice could really atone for sin, or bring sinners into a state of acceptance with God unto eternal life, which did not make full satisfaction to his offended justice, and render it honourable to him to remit the punishment of it. But the legal sacrifices were so far from being thus efficacious, that they did not suffice for the individuals, or the generation of Israel, who presented them, even in respect of a permanent exemption from temporal judgments. For the most solemn of them, at the day of atonement, was rather an annual remembrance of their sins, than a removal of the guilt of them: so that they had only a respect to the year which was past; and the same remembrance was made of sins when the day returned the next year. Indeed it was not "possible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sin," by making an actual atonement to divine justice for it. As divine appointments, such sacrifices might be a suitable acknowledgment of guilt, and profession of repentance, and reliance on the mercy of God, on account of which he might bear with the Israelites, and give them temporal benefits: and they aptly typified the sacrifice of Christ. But they could not possibly render pardoning mercy, in its most plenteous exercise, consistent with the infinite justice and holiness of God; without which nothing could take away sin, according to the apostle's reasoning in this place. (Notes, 8:1,2. 9:18—23. Rom. 3:21—26.)—The same argument equally proves, that the blood of a mere man, or of a mere creature, "cannot take away sin." A guilty creature deserves wrath for his own crimes. If a perfectly holy man had the full disposal of his own life and soul, and could be willing to devote them to destruction, in the stead of a single guilty person; his life might be an adequate ransom for the other's life, his soul for the other's soul; but this must be all: and even in this case, we cannot conceive that God would appoint, allow, or accept such a substitution. If the most exalted of mere creatures should willingly assume our nature, and suffer temporal death, in its most horrible forms, for our salvation; we may easily perceive that the atonement, or compensation to justice would be very small, when compared with the guilt to be pardoned, and the punishment to be remitted, for the sake of it: nor could this render it consistent with the perfect justice of God, to pardon the atrocious and innumerable rebellions of unnumbered millions, and to give them eternal life, in consideration of it. If "without shedding of blood there could be no remission," it must have been, because God saw that sin fully deserved his wrath, and the curse denounced against it, and that it could not consist with perfect distributive justice to remit the punishment, except through a vicarious sacrifice. And if "the blood of bulls and goats could not possibly take away sin;" it must have been, because they were not a sufficient satisfaction to divine justice; or, in other words, a sufficient declaration of God's holy hatred of sin, his judgment of its desert, and his determination to maintain the honour of his broken law, in order to render it consistent with his glory, finally to pardon sinners on account of the sacrifice offered. Now it must be evident, that the crucifixion of Peter, or of Paul, even if free from sin, would have exhibited nothing decisive in this matter; there would have been no equality between the sufferer or his sufferings, and the criminals to be pardoned, and the punishment to be remitted for the sake of it: and the case must still be the same, how high soever we ascend in the scale of created beings. But when "God manifested in the flesh" became the Sacrifice, and his death upon the cross the Ransom; when "God purchased the church with his own blood;" the Sufferer being of infinite dignity, his voluntary sufferings were of infinite value. The perfect justice and holiness of God, and the honour of his law, are as legible in the cross of Christ as his love to sinners; his infinite purity, and infinite mercy, unite in perfect and eternal harmony; while unnumbered millions of rebels, who deserve the final wrath of God, are pardoned, and made heirs of eternal felicity, through this satisfaction of inestimable value. We may perceive that this was an expedient adequate to its object; and that such a sacrifice would suffice for the sins of the whole world, if all men actually came to God through it. It is necessary for us to insist upon this, not only as comprising an unanswerable argument for the real Deity and the proper atonement of Christ, but because many, who profess to believe both these truths, under colour of blaming metaphysical exactness in stating doctrines, and affecting to treat the orthodox reformers, doctrinal Puritans, and modern preachers of the gospel, as men of narrow minds, advance many things contrary to the apostle's reasoning in this passage: as if Christ's sacrifice derived all its efficacy from the appointment of God, and not from his personal Deity and excellency; (which was "the altar that sanctified the gift;") and as if, had the Lord so pleased, an inferior sacrifice might have equally answered the purpose. But surely they forget that God appointed the sacrifices of bulls and goats, as well as that of his Son: yet "it was not possible" for the former to take away sin, but the latter at once effected it, because of its intrinsic value.—'Divine acceptation must not be assigned as the only cause that the oblation of our Saviour's body was thus available for the expiation of the guilt of sin: for then no reason can be given why he might not have accepted of the blood of bulls and goats, and much more of the sufferings of any ordinary man. ... But the great reason, why "the blood of bulls and goats could never take away sins," is this, that they could never answer the great ends of punishment, and thereby render it consistent with the honour of the governor, and with the ends of government, to admit the substitution of them in our stead. ... By the obedience of our Lord Jesus Christ unto the death, in our stead, these ends of punishment are very signally obtained, and that with more advantage to God's glory, than if the punishment of our offences had been inflicted upon us; and so God, by it, may be truly said to have been satisfied, seeing that justice ... is truly satisfied, when all those ends for which the punishment of the offender could be desired, are obtained. ... 1. God by this dispensation hath given us the best and most effectual example, to deter us from sin. ... If he, who was the well beloved Son of God, found it so dreadful to lie under the burden for some hours, to lie exposed for ever to it must be far more intolerable. ... If on this account "God spared not his own Son," we may be sure he will not spare his stubborn enemies. ... 2. God, by this method, hath taken a most excellent way for reformation of the sinner. ... 3. But that none of these ends could be at all obtained, by the substitution of a bull, or goat, or ram, to suffer in our stead, must be extremely evident; ... for this would rather tempt men to conceive that God's displeasure against sin could not be great, ... and that he was not much concerned for any satisfaction for the violations of his law, when such slight matters were by him thought sufficient expiations for them.' Whitby.

V. 5—10. To prove his doctrine in the most unanswerable manner, the apostle referred the Hebrews to a remarkable prophecy of the Messiah; which showed that his coming was the necessary consequence of the inefficacy of the legal sacrifices, and of the Lord's purpose of saving sinners. (Note, Ps. 40:6—8.) The Messiah, speaking concerning his "coming into the world," remarked that JEHOVAH had no delight in the sacrifices of the law; (Notes, Ps. 50:7—15. Is. 1:10—15.) but "that he had prepared a body for him."—When JEHOVAH received no satisfaction from the legal sacrifices, not merely because the people rested in them after a formal and self-righteous manner, but especially because they did not sufficiently display the honour of his justice in pardoning sinners; the eternal Son declared his readiness to come into the world in human nature for that purpose, according as it had been written of him in "the volume of the book," or in opening the roll of prophecy, in which he had been promised as "the Seed of the woman." (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) Now the apostle argued from this, that the evident contrast in the prophecy quoted, between "the sacrifices, in which JEHOVAH had no pleasure," and the obedience of the Messiah to his whole will, in which he would be fully satisfied, was an evident intimation that he intended to remove the former, in order to establish the latter in its full glory, and as the only ground of sinners being pardoned and saved. By this will of God, perfectly performed by Christ, in his obedience unto the death upon the cross, Christians were "sanctified" and consecrated to God, as accepted and spiritual worshippers; "through the offering of his body once for all," with which his mediatorial obedience had been completed. (Note, 13:9—14.)—'From this memorable passage of the fortieth Psalm, we learn, that the only expiation for sin, which God ever appointed, is the sacrifice of his Son in the human nature; that all the sacrifices, which he appointed to the Israelites, were nothing but emblems of the sacrifice of Christ; and that, the sacrifice of Christ being offered, the emblems of it are now fitly laid aside; that under the gospel dispensation there might remain to mankind no sacrifice, having pretension to take away sin, but the sacrifice of Christ, expressly established by God himself, as the meritorious cause of our pardon.' Macknight.—When he cometh. (5) Note, 1 Tim. 1:15, 16.—A body, &c.] The words in the Psalm are, "mine ears hast thou opened," or "bored:" (Note, Ex. 21:3—6.) and it has perplexed many expositors to determine why the apostle, writing to the Hebrews, should quote from the Septuagint, where that translation evidently differs from the Hebrew. But he probably supposed that the words conveyed the general meaning of the passage: and that the production of the holy human nature of Christ was that preparation for his mediatorial obedience, which was intended by that expression, "mine ears hast thou opened." The quotation, however, is not exactly from the Septuagint, which seems to have been made from some other reading than that found in our present copies. The meaning, however, and the apostle's argument, are not at all affected by the variation.

V. 11—18. "Every priest" of Aaron's order stood, as a servant at his work, "offering" repeatedly the same ineffectual sacrifices: some of the priests did this every day; and the high-priest did it every year on the day of atonement. (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, 1,2. 7:26,28.) But "this Person," or this Priest, even Christ, after the offering of one sacrifice, (because that was of infinite value and eternal efficacy,) "sat down" at the right hand of God, as "a Priest upon his throne;" from that time waiting the fulfilment of the prophecy or promise, which engaged that all his enemies should be put under his feet. (Notes, 7:1—3,11—17. Ps. 110:1. Matt. 22:41—46. 1 Cor. 15:20,28.) For by his one oblation, he had provided effectually for the perfect justification unto eternal life of all those who should ever receive his atonement, by faith springing from regeneration, and evidenced "by the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience," and who were thus set apart and consecrated to the service of God. To this the Holy Spirit had borne testimony in the Scripture which had been before quoted. (Note, 8:7—13.) According to the covenant there spoken of, when the laws of God are written in the heart, every kind and degree of sin is for ever pardoned: for Christ "by his one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;" and where such perfect remission is vouchsafed, there needs no more sacrifice for sins. For though justified persons continually contract new guilt, and their best services need forgiveness; yet the sacrifice of Christ continually applied to, in the exercise of penitent faith, preserves their peace; and if the exercise of repentance and faith be at any time intermitted, through temptation and sin; corrections, rebukes, and terrors, bring them back again to the same remedy: and thus their justification is, as it were, a permanent act of God, continued in their daily pardon and acceptance for Christ's sake, through life, even unto death, and so in judgment and to eternity. ness," into the immediate presence of God in the most holy place, and to the mercy-seat, even beyond what was permitted to the high-priest himself under the law; it behooved them to make use of this privilege. (Notes, 4:14—16. Eph. 2:14—18. 3:9—12.) For they were in no danger of being punished as presumptuous, notwithstanding their sinfulness and the holiness of God, how often soever they came before him; provided they humbly depended on "the blood of Jesus" for acceptance. They might now have access "into the holiest, by a new way." The original way of acceptance and communion with God, through "the righteousness of works," had been finally shut up by the entrance of sin. (Note, Gen. 3:22—24.) The typical sacrifices could not open another way, as the restrictions and exclusions, before stated, evidently showed: while even the admission of the high-priest, on the day of atonement only, being preceded with recent sacrifices and blood newly shed, "signified that the way into the holiest was not yet manifested." But the blood of Jesus is always, as it were, "newly shed;" it never loses its efficacy, and may at any time, and by any sinner, be presented in faith before the mercy-seat; and it never fails to procure, to all who thus plead it, a free and acceptable access to God. This way is also "living:" as Jesus, the High-Priest, "ever liveth" to intercede before the throne of God for us, as the Way itself gives life, as it were, to those that come in it, and as it leads to eternal life. (Note, John 14:4—6.) This "new and living way" Christ has consecrated, authorized, and set apart for this purpose, that we may "come to God" in the holiest, upon a mercy-seat, "through the veil, that is, his flesh." JEHOVAH displayed his glory above the mercy-seat, in the holy of holies, before the coming of Christ; but this glory was covered and concealed by the veil; that is, the harmony of infinite holiness with pardoning mercy, in the divine conduct and character, was not clearly discovered or understood. (Notes, 9:1—10. Ex. 26:31—33.) But when the human nature of Christ, the Son of God, was wounded and bruised for our sins; and when he expired on the cross, "the veil was rent from top to bottom." (Note, Matt. 27:51—53.) The obscurity was then removed, and "a just God and a Saviour" was openly revealed to mankind; displaying his glory from the mercy-seat, and exercising most abundant grace even to the chief of sinners, in a manner most honourable to his infinite purity. Having such "a Way" to God, and "such a High-Priest over" the true sanctuary; it was not proper that they, to whom these things were made known, should stand at a distance, as afraid to approach, or averse to the most cordial reconciliation and friendship. The apostle therefore joined himself to those whom he addressed, and called on them to accompany him "in drawing near" to the Lord, with fervent desires, large expectations, and continual prayers and thanksgivings; with sincerity and integrity of heart, as real penitents and upright worshippers, fearing nothing but hypocrisy; (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2.) and "in full assurance of faith," most firmly believing, that God would accept the persons and services of all those who came to him in this appointed manner. (Note, John 1:47—51.) They might indeed very properly examine themselves, whether they were true believers or not: and so admit a doubt of their own sincerity, or personal acceptance; and therefore "the full assurance of hope" could not always be a duty, any more than always attainable: yet they must never allow themselves to doubt of the truth of the testimony of God, or his faithfulness to his promises; so that "the full assurance of faith" was always their duty; though in that, as in other things, they would come short of it. (Note, 6:11,12.)—In order to draw near in this manner, they must "have their hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience," by a special reliance on the atoning blood of Christ, to take away their sense of guilt and fears of wrath, and to give them solid peace; (Notes 11:28. 12:22—25. 1 Pet. 1:1,2.) connected with the purifying of their consciences from error, ignorance, partiality, and insensibility, or whatever might render them quiet, in the allowance of any kind or degree of sin; and with the cleansing of their hearts from all corrupt and carnal affections. (Notes, 9:11—14. Lev. 14:4—7. Num. 19:5—10. Ps. 51:7. Is. 52:13—15. Ez. 36:25—27.) Their "bodies also must be washed with pure water." As the priests were washed with water, before they were admitted to enter upon their office, and continually washed themselves, in some measure, before they officiated; and as divers baptisms were appointed to the worshippers by the law; (Notes, 9:8—10. Ex. 29:1—7. 30:18—21.) so the use of water in baptism was to be a constant memorial to Christians, that their outward conduct should be pure and holy before men, as well as their hearts and consciences cleansed in the sight of God. (Notes, Zech. 13:1. Matt. 3:5,6. 28:18—20. John 3:4,5. 1 Cor. 6:9—11 Eph. 5:22—27. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 3:19—22. Rev. 7:13—1.) Thus they would approve themselves to be spiritual worshippers; and, whilst they derived comfort and grace from their reconciled Father, they would "adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things."

V. 23—25. The apostle further called on his brethren to unite with him, in "holding fast the profession of their faith" in Christ, "without wavering" in it, faultering about it, or shrinking from the persecutions to which it would expose them: being assured that God would vouchsafe them those present supports, and the future felicity, which he had promised; and depending on his faithfulness in this respect. (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 10:13. 1 Thes. 5:23—28.) They ought also affectionately to consider one another's interests, dangers, and situations, and inquire by what means they could be of service to each other: especially they should endeavour, by their example and exhortations, to stimulate one another to the more vigorous and abundant exercise of love, and the zealous practice of good works. Nor ought they, from fear of the reproaches and persecutions of their enemies, or from any prejudices or slothfulness, to forsake the assembling of themselves together, on the Lord's day, or at other times, to worship God in his ordinances, and to hear his word; as the manner of some was, who, having professed Christianity, were induced, through timidity or lukewarmness, to decline attendance on the public assemblies. On the contrary, they ought to "exhort one another" continually to be bold, constant, and diligent in their holy religion, in honouring God before his enemies, and in seeking their own and each other's edification, and establishment in the faith. (Note, 3:7—13.) This they should the more resolutely perform: as they might clearly see the signs of Jerusalem's approaching desolation, which the Lord Jesus had mentioned in his predictions of that catastrophe, and which was evidently approaching. (Notes, Matt. 24:)—This epistle was written only a few years before that event, and as this would be a critical deliverance of Christians, from the persecutions of the Jews, so it would be peculiarly terrible to apostates.—Faith. (23) Hope is the general and approved reading. (Notes, 3:1—6,14—19. 6:11,12. 1 Pet. 1:13—16.)

V. 26, 27. (Notes, 6:4—8.) The Hebrews would be strongly tempted to apostacy, not only by the virulence of their persecuting countrymen, but by their own undue attachment to the legal sacrifices. So long as they supposed, that the blood of bulls, lambs, or "goats could take away sin," they would hope for pardon and salvation even in renouncing Christianity, and so escaping persecution; and thus they might be induced to "sin wilfully, after they had received the knowledge of the truth." The whole argument shows, that the apostle principally intended a wilful, deliberate, and per-tinacious apostacy: not the effect of ignorance or sudden surprise; but against the convictions of their own consciences, and in a presumptuous and obstinate manner: though he expressed himself in such language, as might also warn the readers against every kind of wilful, deliberate, and presumptuous sin. The persons spoken of were such as had "received the knowledge of the truth," and were so enlightened, in respect of the evidences and doctrines of Christianity, as to make a credible and intelligent profession of it, even in the time of the apostles. When this had preceded, a wilful renunciation of Christianity to return to Judaism, either from a determined purpose of escaping persecution, or from proud and carnal enmity to the humiliating and spiritual truths of the gospel, would generally be fatal. In respect of such apostates, "there remained no more sacrifice for sin." The legal sacrifices had lost all their validity and efficacy to avert even national judgments, since the death of Christ, which was the Substance of all these shadows: so that the Jewish nation was devoted to speedy destruction, for crucifying their Messiah and rejecting his gospel. Their most exact and zealous attention to the legal expiations could not procure the least respite from their approaching miseries, or any alleviation of them; and the apostates wilfully chose their portion with that devoted generation, "after having received the knowledge of the truth." Nor could it be expected, that they would ever be "renewed to repentance" of this atrocious and presumptuous wickedness: for they must have witnessed so many miracles, and some of them even have exercised such gifts of the Holy Spirit themselves, that it might be supposed they had committed the blasphemy against that divine Agent, by ascribing his operation to satanical influence; and that they would be given up to final impenitence and unbelief, and be wholly excluded from the benefit of Christ's efficacious sacrifice. (Note, Matt. 12:31,32.) So that nothing would "remain" for them, either as individuals, or as a part of the Jewish nation, in respect of their temporal or their eternal state; but "a certain" most terrible expectation of the judgment and vengeance of God; and of his indignation, like flaming fire, to consume them as his implacable enemies, and sacrifices to his offended justice, in the same manner that the fire on the altar consumed the typical sacrifices. (Notes, Gen. 4:3—5. Lev. 1:3,4. 9:24.)—There seems in this awful passage to be a peculiar reference to the unexampled miseries which came soon after on the Jewish nation, and to their desperate rage and fury in the midst of them. This horror of conscience, connected with desperation and all its tremendous effects, (as in the case of Judas,) might be expected to be most common among apostates from Christianity, who had done violence to their own convictions, and sinned against their better knowledge with presumptuous enmity, when they saw matters evidently coming to those extremities which Christ had predicted. But this horror and despair were only a shadow of the unspeakable anguish, to which they would at length be reduced, when the insulted Saviour should proceed to execute vengeance upon them, from which they would see that it was impossible to escape.—Sometimes apostates have perceived their desperate condition before death, and, in all the horrors and blasphemous rage of damned spirits, have served as beacons to warn others, not to imitate their conduct. Probably, there were few or no instances of such enlightened and deliberate apostates being restored: perhaps several of them had been known to be given up to the most tremendous horrors of conscience; and it was peculiarly proper to state this matter in such strong language, for the benefit of others. (Notes, Matt. 12:43—45. 2 Tim. 2:23—26. 4:14,15. 2 Pet. 2:20—22. 1 John 5:16—18.) Yet this did not imply, that any penitent would fail of obtaining mercy; or that any one would be excluded from the benefit of the Saviour's sacrifice, who humbly, earnestly, and perseveringly sought it; into whatever sins he had been betrayed. The persons spoken of are considered as "adversaries," which cannot properly be applied to the case of any trembling, weeping, praying penitent. It was not probable, that such apostates, as were described, would, in the peculiar circumstances of those times, return to seek forgiveness by faith in the blood of Christ; and their danger consisted in being given up to final obduracy, or desperation. The passage, therefore, can have nothing to do with the case of persons, called Christians, in these days, who had not previously received the knowledge either of the evidences or doctrines of Christianity; but who, through ignorance, or the artifices of wicked men, have been led to doubt or deny the truth of the Scriptures, without any of the peculiar aggravations of these primitive apostates. Some of these persons, being afterwards "renewed to repentance," have assuredly believed the gospel, experienced the power of its truth in their hearts, and produced the fruits of it in their lives: yet Satan has taken advantage of the sound of this and similar passages, and of some unguarded things which expositors or preachers have said on the subject, to harass them with perpetual apprehensions, that there remained no benefit for them in the sacrifice of Christ, because they once doubted the truth of Christianity; though they now value that salvation more than all the world.—Cases of this kind have fallen under the writer's cognizance: and in this day of skepticism and infidelity, in which multitudes aspire to the reputation of free-thinkers, by never thinking seriously at all, there may be many of the same kind. For when Satan can no longer buoy up men in unbelieving presumption, he endeavours to drive them into unbelieving desperation; and, he never fails to harass those to the utmost, whose destruction he cannot compass. Even when the gospel has been renounced, after far clearer knowledge, and with much greater malignity, than in the case before stated, the apostacy cannot be fatal unless it be final. It is the peculiar honour of the mercy of God, and of the redemption of Christ, that none are excluded, who are willing to accept of them in the prescribed manner: "Him that cometh unto Christ, he will in no wise cast out," whatever he has before been guilty of: (Note, John 6:36—40.) but when professed Christians are tempted to apostacy, they may well fear, lest God should be provoked to give them up to final obduracy, and a reprobate mind; and then, while living on earth, their doom is as irreversibly fixed as that of devils or damned spirits.—'The apostle lays it down as certain, that God will not pardon sinners, without some sacrifice or satisfaction. For otherwise, it would not follow, from there remaining to apostates no other sacrifice for sin, that there must remain to them a dreadful expectation of judgment.' Macknight.—The knowledge of the truth. (26) He does not say "The love of the truth."

V. 28—31. The sacrifices of the law were principally appointed for "sins of ignorance," infirmity, or inadvertency; but presumptuous transgressors were excluded from that benefit. (Notes, Lev. 4:5. 6:1—7. Num. 15:22—31. 1 Sam. 2:23—25,29. 3:14. Ps. 19:12—14. 51:16.) "He," therefore, "who despised the law of Moses," and deliberately violated its plain commands, in contempt and defiance of the authority and vengeance of God, was punishable with death, and excluded from mercy, when the fact had been legally proved: even though the crime were such, as might otherwise have been pardoned through a trespass-offering. (Notes, 2:1—4. 12:15—17,22—25. Num. 15:32—36. Matt. 3:7—10.) But "of how much severer" vengeance would they be adjudged deserving, who renounced the gospel, in that wilful, contemptuous, and presumptuous manner, which had been described! They had indeed, as it were, "trampled upon the Son of God," with insolent defiance and disdain, by doing all in their power to dishonour him, and to provoke him, with the most desperate ingratitude and impiety: they had esteemed the precious "blood of the new covenant," by the shedding of which Christ "had been sanctified," or consecrated, to be the High-Priest and Advocate of sinners in the heavenly sanctuary, as if it had been an unclean thing, less holy than the blood of goats, or as vile as that of a malefactor! (Notes, 5:7—10. 13:20,21.) Some indeed apply the word sanctified to the apostate; who had been admitted into the church, as set apart for God, and consecrated to his service, by professing faith in the blood of Christ, which he afterwards vilified.—In either case, it may refer to those blasphemies, against "Jesus of Nazareth," which were often required of such as renounced the gospel, in order to avoid death, or other sufferings; and which apostates would commonly use, in order to gain confidence with the party which they had joined.—They had moreover "done despite to the Holy Spirit," the divine and gracious Author of spiritual life, and all holy consolations in the souls of sinners. They had acted in direct opposition to the convictions of the Holy Spirit, and to his strivings with them. In renouncing Christianity, they traduced, with most virulent reproaches, that religion, which was adorned by the holy fruits of the Spirit, in the lives of its professors: and above all, by ascribing his miraculous power to divination and satanical agency, even contrary to their own knowledge: thus 33 Partly, while ye were [b]made a gazing-stock, both [c]by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, [d]while ye became companions of them that were so used.

they acted as if they were determined to provoke him in the most despiteful manner possible. (Notes, Matt. 12:31,32. Luke 12:8—10.) So that, the authority and mercy of the Father, the Person, love, and atoning blood of the Son, and the Person and operations of the Holy Spirit, were alike insulted and blasphemed by them, after having professed the gospel, and having been baptized "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost!" yea, many of them at least, after having received the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the hands of the apostles! and what punishment could be too severe for such accumulated guilt! Nor ought any man, when tempted so atrocious a crime, to flatter himself with hopes of impunity, from the immensity of the divine mercy; seeing God had declared that "vengeance belonged to him" as his peculiar prerogative; and that he would "judge his people," being determined to punish with most decided severity, the crimes of such as renounced his worship, or committed and continued in wickedness to the disgrace of their profession. (Notes, Deut. 32:34—43. Rom. 12:17—21.) It would indeed be found, and might be known, to be a "terrible thing," beyond all expression or imagination, to "fall into the hands of the living," the eternal, the almighty God, as sacrifices to his justice, and objects of his vengeance and abhorrence; without any oblation, or any Mediator, to appease his indignation. (Note, 2 Sam. 24:12—14.) This was about to be the case with the Jewish nation; and it would peculiarly be the doom of wilful and malignant apostates from Christianity.—'The epithet, of living, is given to God, in this passage, where his vengeance is spoken of, to show, that as he lives for ever he can punish for ever; a consideration which adds to the terribleness of his vengeance.' Macknight.

V. 32—34. The apostle here proceeded to warn and exhort the Hebrews, by other topics. To fortify their minds against temptations to apostacy, or to other wilful and presumptuous sins, they ought frequently to recollect the former days of their profession; and to consider what they had already ventured, suffered, and renounced for Christ, and how they had been supported and comforted under their trials. When they were first "illuminated" in the knowledge of the gospel, (Notes, 6:4—6. 2 Cor. 4:3—6.) and had been admitted into the Christian church: they were speedily called, as soldiers to the combat, to contend with persecutions and afflictions. Some of them were made a public spectacle to their neighbours, by the malicious accusations brought against them, and by the disgrace, derision, and punishment laid upon them: others were the "companions" or partners of those who were thus cruelly entreated; and thus were called to join sympathy with their afflicted brethren, to alarms on their own account. Among those whom the apostle especially addressed, were several that had "shown compassion to him" some years before, when he was bound at Jerusalem, and in his subsequent imprisonment: and when, on that or other accounts, their property was seized and confiscated, they bore it, not only patiently, but "joyfully;" having abundant consolation from the assurance that they had "in heaven a better and more enduring inheritance," which could not be taken from them, but would be their substantial felicity for ever. For they possessed in themselves, independently of all external things, the pledges and earnests of that expected blessing.

V. 35—39. Let then none of those who had acted hitherto in so honourable and consistent a manner, at length "cast away their confidence" in Christ, or renounce the profession of his name, which they had boldly made; and to which a most gracious and abundant recompense was promised. Some, indeed, who once seemed to be zealous believers, had apostatized, and the rest would surely be tried greatly. They had therefore need to have their minds armed with patient resignation and persevering constancy: that "having done the will of God," by steadfastly cleaving to Christ, and obeying him, through all temptations and sufferings, they might afterwards receive the promised gift of eternal life. For in regard to their final deliverance from trouble, as well as to the coming of Christ to take vengeance on the Jewish nation, and thus to deliver the Christian church from the persecutions which they endured from that quarter, the words of God by the prophet might properly be applied: "The just by faith would live." (Notes, Hab. 2:1—4.) Thus it had been predicted: but proud unbelievers would be cut off and perish. If therefore any man, who had made the most plausible profession of faith in Christ, should draw back in the time of trial, and finally apostatize; the Lord declared, by his apostle, according to the tenor of his whole word, and speaking after the manner of men, that "his soul should have no pleasure in him;" that is, he would utterly reject and entirely abhor him. Many of the Hebrews had thus evidenced the insincerity of their profession by apostacy; and others began to "forsake the assembling of themselves together," who needed to be reproved and warned: not the apostle trusted that he himself, and they whom he immediately addressed, were not of the same character with those "who drew back to perdition, but of them that believed to the saving of their souls;" even such as were partakers of living faith, and would be "kept through it by the power of God unto salvation." The just, &c. (38) "The just man," (the word is singular here, in the Septuagint, and in the Hebrew,) "by faith shall live: but if he draw back, &c."—The insertion of the words, "any man," has been justly objected to; for, if the just man himself draw back, and continue in apostacy, he shall finally perish; and we must not alter the Scriptures, to support our own view of evangelical truth. (Note, Ez. 3:20,21.)—In the Septuagint, however, whence the quotation is made, the clauses are reversed: "If he draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him: but the just by the faith of me, shall live." And here, "the just by faith, who shall live," is clearly distinguished, as another character, from him, who "drew back to perdition," in the concluding verse. The Septuagint seems to have read the Hebrew very differently from our copies; but the meaning of each is important.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. So precious are the blessings which come to us through the gospel, that all "sacrifices" and ordinances, however varied and multiplied, could only be an indistinct shadow, and not so much as an exact image of them: and, in like manner, the most nervous language, the most lively expressions, and the most fervent affections, fall immensely beneath their real excellency. The righteousness brought in by Christ, and the sacrifice once offered by him, are of infinite and eternal efficacy, and "his salvation shall never be abolished." They suffice to make all "the comers thereunto perfect:" "the worshippers, once purged" by his atoning blood, need seek no other sacrifice; nor will they, by the consciousness of guilt, be ever driven to adopt such expedients, as "call sin to remembrance," yet cannot possibly take it away. But daily applying to the great propitiation, they derive from it both strength, and motives for obedience, and inward comfort, notwithstanding their remaining sinfulness.—Most certain it is from these chapters, that God will not pardon any transgression, without such a sacrifice as can really expiate the guilt of it. And if those sacrifices, which were of his own appointment, "could not take away sin," because they could not satisfy the demands of his justice; let none suppose that human inventions, self-imposed penances, prayers, tears, amendments, moral virtues, alms-deeds, or any other device or performance, can avail in the behalf of those who substitute them in the stead of the sacrifice of the Son of God: "for if righteousness," in any way or degree, "come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain." (Notes, Is. 40:12—17. Mic. 6:6—8. Gal. 2:17—21.)

appointment, and no contrivances of man's devising, could in the least avail; he, according as it had been written of him in "the volume of the book" from the beginning, with infinite compassion towards our deserved misery, came in human nature, to accomplish the will of the Father, and to "bear our sins in his own body on the tree." (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) Thus, "by one sacrifice for sins" he effected the glorious and gracious design; and now, seated on the right hand of God, he henceforth "expects till all his enemies shall be put under his feet." What then remains, but that we seek an interest in this sacrifice by faith, and the seal of it to our souls by "the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience?" Thus, by "the law being written in our hearts," we may know that we are perfectly justified, and that God will no more remember any of our sins and iniquities.—'Lord, have mercy upon us; and write all thy laws in our hearts, we beseech thee.'

V. 19—25. Having "access with boldness into the holiest, by the blood of Jesus," by "the new and living way which he hath consecrated for us," through the rending of the veil by his crucifixion for our sins; and "having such a High-Priest over the house of God;" let us not stand at a distance, or turn away from him who "beseeches us to be reconciled." (Notes, Is. 55:6,7. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Jam. 4:7—10.) Let us, in the first place, beware of hypocrisy, that we may "draw near with a true heart:" let us watch and pray against unbelief, that we may come "in the full assurance of faith," knowing this to be the appointed and only way of acceptance and salvation: let us apply his blood to purge us from guilt, and seek for his promised grace, to cleanse us from all our filthiness; that so, our "hearts being sprinkled from an evil conscience," we may "lay aside the body of the sins of the flesh," and "henceforth walk in newness of life." Thus we shall be enabled to "hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering," whatever temptations or seducing examples we may meet with; knowing that "he is faithful who hath promised:" and, with composed and cheerful minds, we shall be enabled to consider the cases of our brethren, that we may animate and "stimulate them to love and good works."—But, if they were not to be excused who, in the time of severe persecution, forsook the assembling of themselves together; how shall we answer it to God, if in these favoured days, we indolently absent ourselves from the assemblies of his saints, and neglect to honour him by attendance on his ordinances? Against such evils we should warn others most earnestly; and we ought ourselves gladly "to suffer the word of exhortation," as knowing that the day of death and of judgment speedily approaches.

V. 26—39. By negligence, pride, or carnal self-love, or by gradually yielding to the fear of man, many professors of the gospel are left to "sin wilfully after they have received the knowledge of the truth:" and, though the fallen, the weak, and the trembling should be encouraged; yet we cannot too awfully alarm the secure, self-confident, and presumptuous: as every deliberate sin, against light and conscience, is a step towards the tremendous precipice described by the apostle. Neither the mercy of God, nor the sacrifice of Christ, nor the love of the Spirit, will profit that man, "who tramples under foot the Son of God," treats his atoning blood with insolent contempt, "and does despite to the Spirit of grace." For daring rebels and apostates of this description, "there remains no more" or other "sacrifice for sin; but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, to consume" them as the enemies of the Lord. "To him belongeth vengeance;" and his righteous recompenses on the crimes committed by hypocrites and apostates, will be more terrible than the doom of Sodom, or than that executed upon the devoted Jews. However men may now despise these warnings, they will at length know, that it is "a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God;" and to hear him say, "It is a people, that hath no understanding; therefore he who made them will have no mercy on them." (Note, Is. 27:7—11.) Let then every professed Christian "give diligence to make his calling and election sure:" let us all remember our convictions, affections, and purposes, when we were first "enlightened;" and how we thought that we should be willing to endure or part with any thing, if we could but obtain peace with God and a good hope of salvation: and let us also remember our consolations and supports under former trials. If we have been called to "endure a great fight of afflictions," and have suffered reproaches and losses with fortitude and cheerfulness, from a persuasion that we had "in heaven a better and a more enduring substance;" let us not disgrace our former conduct, or "cast away our confidence, which hath great recompense of reward." For we still "have need of patience" and perseverance, whilst we wait the accomplishment of God's promises, in obedience to his will. But "the time is short;" he that cometh, will soon come, and will not tarry beyond his appointed season; and he will shortly end our sorrows and conflicts, by removing our souls to heaven: yea, he will speedily come to raise the dead, and perfect our salvation.—Let us then show that we are justified through faith, by living and "walking with God" in dependence upon his promises, and in obedience to his commands, because we are satisfied with the security of his word. Thus we shall possess the assurance, that "we are not of them who draw back to perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. The apostle, having referred to the prophet's testimony, that "the just by faith shall live," (Note, 10:35—39.) proceeded more fully to show the nature and efficacy of faith; and to prove, by scriptural examples, that it had always been the grand distinguishing peculiarity of JEHOVAH'S worshippers, from the beginning of the world. This induction of examples he prefaced by a definition of faith; in which he did not confine his views to one single exercise of that fundamental grace, but took in all the variety of its actings, in the whole of a believer's experience and conduct. Where the principle, from which faith springs, is implanted by the regenerating Spirit of God, it leads a man to receive the truth, concerning justification by the merits of Jesus Christ, according to the measure of light afforded him; (Note, John 1:10—13.) but it will also embrace the whole word of God, and expect its accomplishment, to all the extent in which he has spoken and promised. (2 Thes. 2:13.) This divine faith is "the substance of things hoped for." Crediting "the sure testimony of God," resting on his promises, and expecting the accomplishment of them, it gives the object hoped for at some future period, a present subsistence in the soul, as if already possessed; for the believer is satisfied with the security afforded, and acts under the full persuasion that God will not fail of his engagements. Thus the believer gives up present advantages, and endures present hardships, in obedience to God, and in waiting for his promise: even as men give ready money for an estate in reversion; or endure present labour, in hope of future ease and indulgence. (Notes, 6:16—20. Rom. 5:3—5. 8:24—27. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 1 John 5:1—3.)—But faith has not only respect to the good things hoped for: it is also, "the evidence of things not seen." The things revealed to faith, but invisible to sense, and undiscoverable by reason, may relate to the past, the present, or the future; to God, and to his works of creation, providence, and redemption; to his omniscient presence and his future judgment; to the world of spirits, and the eternal state of happiness or misery; to the law and its sanctions, or the gospel and its privileges; and, in short, to a great variety of particulars which cannot be enumerated. But faith is the evidence, the internal conviction, or demonstration, of them all. To unbelievers those appear false, dubious, or visionary; for they have no medium, by which to obtain satisfaction about them: but believers take the clear "testimony of God," as a truth already demonstrated, which requires no further proof: their argument is this; "God hath said it, and it must be true." In proportion to the strength of this faith, their judgment and conduct are influenced by this realizing conviction, with reference to things revealed; even as if they were the objects of sight, or capable of strict demonstration. The believer uses his powers of reasoning, to obtain satisfaction concerning the evidence, that such or such matters are divinely revealed, and to determine the meaning of the words, in which the revelation is conveyed. (Note, 1 Pet. 3:13—16.) But, when these previous questions are answered, he most rationally says, 'God has determined this point; and though I once thought otherwise, as multitudes still do; yet infinite knowledge and truth have decided against our prejudices and erroneous opinions, and I submit to the divine teaching.' He is not so absurd as to attempt to invalidate the testimony of God by his objections, or even to give force to it by his arguments. (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.) He does not suppose that divine revelation must be level to man's comprehension, or coincide with his speculations: he expects, believes, and adores mysteries; but knows that contradiction is not mystery: so that mysteries above reason he humbly receives, but absurdities contrary to it, he ascribes to misconstruction or imposture. (Notes, Gen. 1:26,27. Matt. 13:10,11. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—This description of faith will be illustrated by all the examples in this chapter. The apostle further observed, that by faith all the pious progenitors of Israel, and other eminent persons in former times, had "obtained a good report," or an honourable character in the word of God. By faith they were justified; and the same was the principle of all their holy obedience and eminent services, and patient constant sufferings in the cause of truth and holiness.—There is no operation of the human soul which can possibly receive and profit by testimony, except faith, or believing. Revelation without faith is and must be as useless, as light without vision. (Note, Acts 26:16—18.)

V. 3. The heavens and the earth, and all things in them, as well as the regular order with which they are governed and directed, might, indeed, be proved by argument to be the contrivance and work of God: (Note, Rom. 1:18—20.) yet men's reason had never come to any satisfactory and practical conclusions in this matter. (Note, Gen. 1:1.) So that, "by faith," crediting the word of God, we believe, and understand to good purpose, that "the worlds" were contrived, framed, created, and arranged in their present order, by the omnipotent command of God: and that the things, which we now behold in such resplendent beauty, were made of those things, "which do not now appear." They were produced from the chaotic mass, which "was without form and void," by that powerful word, which first called the chaos out of nonexistence. (Note, Gen. 1:2.) This was effected in the six days' work of creation: and the satisfactory assurance, which believers derive from the scriptural account of the original of the world, being contrasted with the discordant hypotheses and endless disputations of ancient philosophers and modern theorists, exhibits a very striking illustration of the proposition, that "faith is the evidence," or demonstration, "of things not seen." (Notes, 1,2. Gen. 1: 2:)—This world, which we see, was not made of any appearing or existing matter, but from nothing; contrary to the axiom of all the philosophers, 'From nothing, nothing is made.' This indeed never could enter into the mind of any philosophers, not even of those who wrote that God created the world. Therefore the whole of this is of faith.' Beza.—Nothing can possibly be more unphilosophical, or indeed absurd, than the notion of the eternal pre-existence of that Chaos, from which God created the world: yet, I apprehend, Beza had firm grounds for asserting, that none of the philosophers had perceived this, or without revelation would have perceived it. Most commentators consider this verse as a decided proof, that God created the world from nothing; which no doubt is the doctrine both of reason and revelation.

V. 4. The original word rendered "more excellent," signifies also a "greater," fuller, or more complete sacrifice. Cain brought the meat-offering alone: Abel, as it is generally supposed, brought that, and also "the firstlings of his flock." "By faith," embracing the promise of a Redeemer who was to come, Abel, as a sinner, penitently, humbly, uprightly, and obediently, presented unto God the typical sacrifice, which had been appointed; and he was accepted: but Cain in self-wisdom, self-righteousness, impenitence, unbelief, brought a formal acknowledgment to God of his obligations to him for temporal benefits, but not a sacrifice as the atonement for his sins. He seemed to say, with modern infidels and skeptics; 'In what is my sacrifice inferior to Abel's? Why should he be so bigoted, as to think God will accept none, who do not come in his peculiar way? I, being sincere, shall be as favourably received with my sacrifice as he with his: and indeed it seems more rational to present the first-fruits of the earth, than to slay an innocent lamb, to be burned upon the altar.' (Note, Gen. 4:3—5.) Yet God rejected his offering: and his rage and enmity against Abel, he accepted worshipper of God, produced the same horrid effects, which similar principles have in every age been producing, in cruel persecutions and multiplied murders of believers, especially by formalists and hypocrites. (Notes, Gen 4:6—15. 1 John 3:11—15.)' But God himself attested, that Abel "was righteous" before him, and that his oblations were accepted: so that, being murdered by Cain, he "still speaketh" to us; declaring that sin cannot be pardoned without an atonement, that sinners can come to God, only by penitent faith in the great Propitiation; that faith is uniformly connected with righteousness and upright obedience; that believers have their portion in a better world, and not on earth that they must expect no favour from proud self-righteous unbelievers; and that their blood, shed by persecutors, calls from the ground to heaven for vengeance. (Notes, 12:22—25. Matt. 23:34—36.)—'Abel offered a sin-offering, as well as a meat-offering. ... Whereas Cain, having no sense of sin, thought himself obliged to offer nothing but a meat-offering. ... In this character of Abel, Paul had our Lord's expression in his eye, "the blood of righteous Abel." (Matt. 23:35.)—As in after times God testified his acceptance of particular sacrifices, by sending down fire upon them; ... we may suppose it was in that manner, that he testified Abel's righteousness upon his offering. ... Flesh not being permitted to men till after the flood, Abel must have thought it unlawful to kill any animal, unless God had ordered it to be killed as a sacrifice.' Macknight.

V. 5, 6. (Notes, Gen. 5:21—24. Jude 14—16.) By faith, Enoch was so peculiarly favoured of God, that he was "translated" to heaven, without seeing death, or experiencing its painful stroke; (Luke 2:26. Notes, John 8:48—53. 2 Cor. 5: 1—4.) his body having been changed and rendered incorruptible, that he might immediately enter on his full felicity. So that he was not found on earth, by those who sought him, as the sons of the prophet sought Elijah; for the Lord had taken him to himself. (Note, 2 Kings 2:11—18.) But, before this took place, he had received some evident testimony, that God was pleased with him, and, probably, this was made known to his contemporaries.—Enoch "walked with God" for a long season; and this was the effect of that faith by which he pleased him: for it is, and always was, "impossible" for fallen man "to please God," except by faith; seeing every one, who "cometh to God" to worship and serve him, (Note, 7:23—25.) "must believe that he is." The accepted worshipper must realize his invisible being, presence, and perfections; which can only be done by faith, receiving the Revelation which he has given of himself; otherwise some imaginary deity, some idol, will be substituted in his place. Moreover, he must believe "that God is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek him:" but, as all men deserve condemnation for their sins, and even their best services need forgiveness; no one can know, or on good grounds conclude, that God will reward his services, or accept him in them; unless by receiving the testimony of revelation, either immediate, traditional, or written. This Enoch doubtless did; and so he believed in God, and came to him, by faith in his word and promise, according to his appointment; and thus was accepted and graciously rewarded. But this differs widely from a mere assent to a conjecture, or a conclusion of reason concerning the existence of a God, without any just notions of his perfections, will, or worship; and an attempt to please him, in ways of man's devising. This many suppose to be all "the faith," which the apostle here means: though it does not at all resemble the religion of any one person mentioned in this chapter, except that of Cain. Faith must have respect to some word spoken, which it believes: but the conjectures, or deductions from reasoning, in a man's own mind, cannot be faith, according to the common use of words; much less can such a meaning of faith be found in Scripture. It is "the belief of the truth," of "the word" and "testimony of God."—He pleased God. (5) St. Paul here quotes the Septuagint, where the words, translated in our version, "he walked with God," are twice rendered "he pleased God:" as the same Hebrew term is rendered in other places. (Gen. 6:9. 17:1. 48:15. Sept.) The general meaning is, no doubt, the same, though the language is less emphatical.

(Notes, Gen. 6:—9:) The Lord, by immediate revelation, made known to Noah his purpose of destroying the inhabitants of the whole earth by a flood of water, and "warned him" to prepare for that event. conclude it impossible; or exclaim against it, as inconsistent with the justice or goodness of God. But Noah had faith, which was in him "a demonstration of things not seen:" he verily believed the word which God had spoken, and that such a deluge would come; he confidently expected that Omnipotence would execute the sentence denounced by infinite justice, and fulfil the word of unfailing veracity: he therefore reverenced with holy awe the majesty of God, and was moved with fear of falling under his displeasure: he was aware that unbelief and disobedience would expose him to future vengeance, as well as involve him in the common calamity; and therefore, he was prepared to employ any means of deliverance, which the Lord should see good to appoint. Accordingly, when directed and commanded to prepare an ark, he did not hesitate to obey in the most entire and unreserved manner: though the labour and expense of building so large a vessel, must have been enormous; and though the undertaking must have exposed him to all kinds of ridicule and obloquy, as he might be sure that the unbelieving world would deride him as a visionary and a fanatic, for so singular a conduct. But "he obeyed in faith!" he ventured all consequences, and exercised the needful self-denial: he waited the Lord's time; and preached, though unsuccessfully, to the men of his generation. (Notes, 1 Pet. 3:19,20. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) He expected safety in the ark, though Omnipotence alone could secure him, in a vessel constructed as it was, through so tremendous a deluge. Thus he was preserved, and he preserved his family also, from the common destruction of mankind, to re-people the earth; his example and admonitions concurred in "condemning the world," and in showing the justice of God in thus punishing their universal and incorrigible wickedness. (Notes, Is. 54:6—10,15—17. Ez. 14:13—21. Matt. 12:41,42. Rom. 2:25—29.) By the same faith, he relied on the promise of God concerning the Messiah, and became "heir of the righteousness of faith," and of eternal salvation through him. This may be shown to be an exact representation of the manner in which believers, being warned by God to "flee from the wrath to come," are "moved with fear," take refuge in Christ, part with all for his sake, are often made the instruments of salvation to their families also, "condemn the world, and become heirs of the righteousness of faith." (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Phil. 3:8—11.)—A Jewish writer introduces Noah from the ark, expostulating with those who were perishing, because excluded. They plead, that they had used various means of securing themselves, in case the deluge should come, though they had declined his invitation to come into the ark: but he silences all their pleas at once, by saying, that they had refused to avail themselves of God's appointed way of preservation; and every other method must be unavailing. "How shall ye escape, if ye neglect so great salvation?" (Note, 2:1—4. Matt. 24:36—41.)

V. 8—10. (Notes, Gen. 12:—17:) Next in order of time to the two principal characters of the old world, and to the progenitor of the new world, and even superior to them in eminence, was Abraham the chosen father of Israel, of many nations, of the Messiah, and spiritually of all believers. When he was first selected to be the repository of the promises, "he was called," and commanded, to leave his native country and all its attachments; and to go out into a place, which he was "afterwards to receive for an inheritance," that is, in his posterity. This command was connected with several promises to him and to his seed; by faith he substantiated the blessings hoped for, and was satisfied concerning "the things not seen;" he therefore implicitly obeyed the call of God, and "went forth," not knowing whither he was about to travel. But he was satisfied, that he was following the special guidance of God, under his immediate protection; and he therefore disregarded the objections, persuasions or contempt of those, to whom such a design must have appeared to the last degree visionary and irrational.—By faith in the promise of JEHOVAH, he continued likewise to sojourn as a stranger in that land, which was promised to his posterity, without having any inheritance in it, or even building a house there: but passing his days as a traveller, dwelling in tents, which were easily removed, shifting frequently from one place to another; yet within the land of Canaan, except as he was forced out of it by famine. Thus he spent his life, even after the birth of Isaac, and afterwards of Jacob; who were "the heirs with him of the same promises," and who imitated his example in this manner of life, and in believing obedience to the commandment of God. For he was not desirous of a city in Canaan, or elsewhere: because he expected one of a more excellent nature, which alone has foundations that can never be removed; even the permanent, secure, and blessed city of God, where he displays his glory, and communicates unalloyed felicity: of which He is the Architect. His wisdom and love formed the stupendous plan, and his omnipotence executed it, for the glory of his own name, and the eternal residence of those whom he delights to honour and bless: and what can those magnificent cities be, which proud mortals have erected; compared with that, "the Builder and Maker of" which is the Almighty and everlasting God? Abraham expected Canaan for his posterity, and a mansion in heaven for himself.—If this was the faith of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and this their expectation; can we suppose that such of their posterity, as "obtained a good report by faith," did not believe the same truths, and expect the same inheritance? Nay, can we reasonably doubt, whether this was the popular creed, and hope of Israel, through successive generations, to the time of Christ? We cannot: unless we can suppose, that the Sinai covenant, in which national advantages were secured to Israel, on condition of national obedience, could operate, as the fabled waters of Lethe, to make them entirely forget all preceding revelations made to their forefathers, and transmitted to them; and all the obedient confidence, which their forefathers had placed in those revelations. In fact, there is not one age, in the history of Israel, from the origin of the nation, to the termination of the New Testament, of which we have any remaining records; but in these records, the belief of a future state of just retributions, a future judgment, and a state of supreme blessedness to the righteous, may not be clearly discerned, and pointed out. V. 11, 12. Sarah was at first unbelieving, when a son was promised to her in her old age; but she afterwards was enabled to rely on the faithfulness and power of God, to perform his word, though contrary to the ordinary course of nature; and, in consequence of this faith, she was supernaturally strengthened to conceive and bear a son. Thus, in answer to the expectation of the faith, both of Abraham and Sarah, there sprang from one father, (who apparently was in this respect even as a dead person, from whom no offspring could have been expected,) such an immense multitude, that they were as "the stars of heaven," or even absolutely innumerable, as the sands on the seashore.—This principally refers to the descendants of Abraham by Isaac and Jacob: but those, descended from him by Ishmael, and the sons of Keturah, and from Isaac by Esau, render the fulfilment of the promises to him, in this respect, still more surprising. them and their posterity. (Notes, Gen. 48:49:) For they had not "received the promises," or the things promised; either the inheritance of Canaan, or the coming of the promised Seed, during their lives. (Note, 39,40.) They had endured many hardships and trials, without any such peculiar advantages, as might answer to the singular favour which the Lord declared that he bare to them. But they had "seen the promised blessings afar off, and were persuaded," that they would be performed in due season; they "embraced them" by faith, as their portion, and the inheritance of their posterity; and they gave up present advantages for the sake of them, "confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims upon earth." (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, Gen. 23:3,4. 47:9. 49:18.) Now those who considered themselves, during their whole abode in this world, to be strangers in a foreign land, and travellers through it, plainly declared that they were going home to their native country, the residence of their Father and their most beloved friends, and the place of their permanent abode and enjoyment. Indeed, if weary of this wandering life, they had purposed to return into Mesopotamia, they might have found an opportunity of doing it, and might there have settled among their relations: but this would have been an act of unbelief and disobedience, and a renunciation of the promises. Whereas, by sojourning in a strange land unto death, they declared their supreme desire and hope of a better country than could be found on earth, even of that heavenly inheritance, which Canaan typified. As, therefore, they were willing to renounce all other prospects, to follow God in obedient faith, for the sake of an eternal and invisible inheritance; and, as he had prepared such an inheritance, or permanent, glorious city, for them. (Note, 8—10.) so "he was not ashamed," or did not disdain, "to be called their God," their Friend, and their everlasting Portion. Whereas the advantages, which they had on earth from their believing dependence on him, were too transient and little, to answer to so high a relation; seeing these were neither sufficient for their final felicity, nor for the glory of his divine munificence. V. 17—19. (Notes, Gen. 22:1—19. P. O.) It was peculiarly to be noted, that in the grand instance, in which Abraham had been tried and proved, how far he would carry his unreserved obedience to the Lord, he had been influenced by the same powerful principle of "faith:" even when, in his determined purpose, he had offered up his beloved Isaac as a burnt-offering, in whom God himself had, as it were, laid up the promises: so that he might have thought he was about to render the performance of them impossible, by obeying this hard and mysterious command. But he left this difficulty with God, assured that he was able to restore his son to life, from the ashes to which he was about to reduce his body; though no instance of a resurrection from the dead had hitherto occurred. And in fact he did receive him back, as from the dead; seeing he had for three days lain under the sentence of death.—This, in a most expressive figure, represented the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ, "the Only begotten of the Father," thus delivered for us lost sinners, to bleed and die, and bear the wrath of God for us, by "love which passeth knowledge."—Some indeed explain the last clause, of Isaac's supernatural conception and birth, which, by a figurative manner of speaking, might be called receiving him from the dead: but the other interpretation is far preferable. V. 20. Isaac, as well as Rebekah and Jacob, was highly reprehensible, in the circumstances of the transaction which is here referred to; (Notes, Gen. 25:22,23. 27:1—29.) yet he blessed his two sons, in a firm belief that God would fulfil the promises to his posterity. He also spake by the spirit of prophecy; and he most entirely believed, and acquiesced in the discoveries made of the future condition of the posterity of both Jacob and Esau, though his own purposes were thus disannulled. In a firm belief and assured persuasion, that the promises made to Abraham and to himself would be accomplished, (though under an error, the effect of a criminal partiality for Esau, he mistook the heir of these promises,) he blessed Jacob, supposing that it was Esau: but, subsequent events convincing him of his mistake, he confirmed the blessing pronounced on Jacob, which he afterwards more deliberately ratified; (Notes, Gen. 25:22,23. 28:3,4.) and he also foretold many important particulars, concerning Esau and his descendants. (Notes, Gen. 27:39,40.)

V. 21. Jacob, when his death approached, pronounced a prophetical blessing on each of his twelve sons; but that which respected Ephraim and Manasseh is here especially noted. (Notes, Gen. 47:29—31. 48:) God revealed to him his future purpose concerning their posterity, and, in a firm belief of his word, Jacob "blessed them:" and, though weak and infirm, he expressed his confidence in God, and his gratitude to him, by worshipping him, "leaning on the top of his staff." Thus the Septuagint render the words which, in our version, are translated "the bed's head;" and the variation is immaterial. The same word, by changing merely the vowel points, will bear either signification.—'We have here a lively example of that substance, (Note, 1) which was before commemorated. Jacob, dying a stranger in Egypt, distributes the kingdoms of the Canaanites to his twelve sons, in no other manner, than he would have done, had he reigned in peace at Jerusalem. But how true and solid this "faith, the substance of things hoped for," was, appeared by this, that after many years, the whole concern being committed to the lot, than which nothing seems more fortuitous, the event confirmed Jacob's testament.' Beza.—This learned divine here includes the blessing which Jacob pronounced on all his sons, as well as that on Joseph, with Manasseh and Ephraim. (Notes, Gen. 49:)

V. 22. (Notes, Gen. 50:24—26. Acts 7:15,16.) Joseph, though lord of all the land of Egypt, yet, believing the word and promise of God, concerning the posterity of Abraham, expressed his confident expectation, that they would be performed, in the removal of the Israelites to Canaan: and he ordered his bones to be carried along with them; both as an expression of his faith, and to show that he desired to have his lot, after death, with the people of God, and not with the Egyptians.

V. 23. The parents of Moses also acted from the same powerful principle of faith in the word and promises of God. When that eminent deliverer and lawgiver of Israel was born, they concealed him three months, from those who were appointed by Pharaoh to destroy the male children: for they perceived something uncommon in his appearance, which was supposed to indicate his future eminence. (Note, Acts 7:17—29.) By faith they relied on the promised care and protection of God: and so they "were not terrified by the king's commandment," but preserved the life of their son at the peril of their own. And they acted from the same kind of faith, when they trusted Moses to the care of Providence, in an ark of bulrushes; which believing expectation was answered in his preservation by Pharaoh's daughter, and his education in the court of Egypt, to be the deliverer of Israel. (Notes, Ex. 2:1—10.)

V. 24—26. In like manner, when Moses was grown up, even to the age of forty years, and was become very eminent among the Egyptians; (Note, Acts 7:17—29.) he "refused" any longer "to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter," though tradition reports, and Josephus states, that he was considered as heir of that prosperous kingdom. But, believing the testimony and promises of God concerning Israel, and especially that respecting the Messiah; he would not take his lot among the Egyptians, for the sake of temporal advantages, however great. On the contrary, seeing "the people of God" under the most cruel bondage, and in the most abject condition, he openly avowed himself to be one of them; choosing rather to suffer the most distressing affliction and injuries along with them, and to share the blessings promised to them, than to enjoy all the temporary pleasures, which his high station could have procured him, in the ways of sin and ungodliness. He likewise esteemed "the reproach" cast on Israel, for their expectations of a glorious Redeemer to arise from among them, under whose special care they professed themselves to be; as well as the disgrace of their enslaved condition, to be more valuable than all the immense treasures and revenues of Egypt; so that he renounced the latter, that he might partake of the former. For "he had respect unto the recompense of the reward;" even the gracious and abundant compensation, which Christ confers on all those who are "reproached for his sake." In consequence of this believing choice and purpose, he renounced all his prospects and indulgences in Egypt; and became a refugee, or a stranger, and a humble laborious shepherd, in Midian for forty years. (Notes, Ex. 2:11—25.)—'Esteeming the scoffs, cast on the Israelites, for expecting the Christ to arise from among them, in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed, "greater riches than the treasures of Egypt."' Macknight. (Notes, 13:9—14. 1 Cor. 10:6—10.) '"The recompense of the reward," here mentioned, could not be temporal; for Moses came not into the land of Canaan: nor could he expect any greater blessing in that kind, than he might have had in Egypt. He therefore must have had respect to some spiritual and heavenly recompense.' Whithy.

V. 27. Moses evidently "feared," when he forsook Egypt the first time: (Note, Ex. 2:13—15.) but this relates to his leaving that kingdom the second time, when he led forth the tribes of Israel. He was then strengthened in faith, to disregard the wrath and power of king Pharaoh: he denounced the death of the first-born, left the tyrant's presence, as one who bade defiance to his menaces, and marched out of Egypt with great intrepidity; though he was fully aware, that Pharaoh, with his army, would pursue him. And when that actually took place, he boldly said to the affrighted Israelites, "Fear not, stand still, and see the salvation of the LORD.—The LORD shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace." (Notes, Ex. 9:13—18,33. 10:16,17,29. 11:4—8. 12:29—39. 14: 1—14.) For "he endured" most constantly, in delivering his messages, and in this emergency, though he had no visible protection against the vengeance of Pharaoh; because, by "faith, as the evidence of things not seen," he saw the invisible God as his almighty Defender, and rested assured that he was with him, to take care of and deliver him. (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 1 Tim. 6:13—16.)

V. 28. By the same efficacious faith, Moses foresaw the destruction of the first-born in Egypt, and expected the exemption of Israel from that calamity in the way which the Lord prescribed unto him. He therefore influenced the people to keep the Passover, with "the sprinkling of the blood" upon the door-posts, and the other significant ceremonies: lest the destroying angel should enter their houses also. In this manner they were preserved, and this made way for their deliverance out of bondage.—The whole of this institution has been shown to be not only a memorial of Israel's deliverance, but a typical prefiguration of our salvation by the death of Christ, and by faith in his blood. (Notes, Ex. 12: 3—27. Matt. 26:26—28. 1 Cor. 5:6—8.)

V. 29. Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Caleb, and others, truly believed; and the rest of the nation, by the exhortations of Moses, were excited to a confidence in JEHOVAH'S power and favour, for present deliverance from Pharaoh. But it was chiefly by the faith of Moses, their leader, that the Israelites passed safely through the Red Sea: even as Noah's family were preserved in the ark, by means of his faith; though it does not appear that they were all true believers. (Note, 7.) Israel was the visible church of God, and the type of the whole multitude, who by faith passed through trials and death unhurt: but the Egyptians represented the enemies of God and of his people; and, copying Pharaoh's pride and presumption, they ventured to pursue the Israelites into the sea, and so perished; as all the enemies of the Lord will do at death, which delivers all believers from their enmity and rage. This does not authorize us to suppose, that any of those, here mentioned by name, were destitute of justifying faith; as some have inferred from the subsequent unbelief of many, who passed safely through the Red Sea. (Notes, Ex. 14:10—31. 15:1—18. Ps. 106:12—14.)

V. 30. (Notes, Josh. 6:) Joshua, and many of the Israelites, believing the promise of God, that he would deliver Jericho into their hands, obeyed his command, and induced their brethren to do the same, in respect of the extraordinary means used for that purpose. They expected God to perform his word; and they observed his directions, in marching round the city, and blowing the trumpets for seven days: and in this manner the walls fell down at the appointed time, and afforded them a safe and easy victory. The same principle would lead them to embrace the promises concerning the Messiah, and salvation by him: but in collective bodies, there has always subsisted the difference between real believers, and professors of faith, who concurred with them in the same external services.—'As the land of Canaan belonged to the Israelites, by a grant from "God, the Possessor of heaven and earth;" it was proper that the first city, which resisted them, should be taken in such a manner as to demonstrate the truth of their title.—Thus were ... all the Canaanites made to know the supremacy and power of the God of Israel, and how vain it was to make any resistance.' Macknight. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.)

V. 31. Even Rahab the harlot, hearing that God had denounced the destruction of the Canaanites, and that he had promised manifold blessings to Israel, by faith renounced her connexion with the enemies of God, and sought admission among his people. At the hazard of her life, she entertained, peaceably and as friends, the spies of Israel; and, assured that Jericho would be taken by the Israelites, she stipulated for her own life and that of her relations, as if that event had already taken place. Thus she escaped the destruction of her unbelieving citizens, who persisted in their enmity to God and to Israel.—Doubtless she embraced the promises concerning the Messiah and spiritual salvation, in the same obedient manner, when she was made acquainted with them: and thus she was incorporated among the Israelites, and became an ancestor of Christ.—But the fruits and the infirmities of her faith have already been fully considered. V. 32—34. The history of the eminent persons, here mentioned in general terms, has already been considered. It would have exceeded proper bounds, for the apostle to speak particularly concerning each of them, and of all who might have been adduced as examples in this argument. These, who are mentioned, are not placed in the order of time in which they lived, but as they occurred to the apostle's mind: and the whole succession of the prophets are mentioned at once. By faith, crediting the testimony of God, and substantiating his promises, some of them, namely, Joshua and David, subdued the nations of Canaan and the neighbouring kingdoms, as the servants of God in the cause of Israel. (Notes, Josh. 6:—11: 2 Sam. 5:6—25. 8: 10:) Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson, had wrought wonderful deliverances for their people, in dependence on the power, and obedience to the commands of God. (Notes, Judg. 6:—8: 11: 13:—16:) Others performed most eminent obedience to his commandments, or executed justice and reformed the nation; and they waited for and obtained most remarkable accomplishments of the divine promises, to them and their people. Some had even, in the exercise of faith in God, been enabled to stop the mouths of lions. Samson and David slew each of them a lion. (Notes, Judg. 14: 1 Sam. 17:34—37.) Daniel the prophet spent the night in a den of hungry lions. (Notes, Dan. 6:) Others quenched the violence of fire. (Notes, Dan. 3:) Elijah was repeatedly delivered from the persecuting rage of Ahab, Jezebel, and Ahaziah; Micaiah from that of Ahab; Elisha from the sword of the kings of Israel and Syria; and Jeremiah from that of Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah's princes. (Notes, 1 Kings 17: 18: 19: 22: 2 Kings 1:—4: Jer. 26: 38:8—13.) Hezekiah and others were miraculously recovered from sickness; and Hezekiah's kingdom was restored, from the utmost debility to a very flourishing condition, in answer to his confidence in God. Many instances occur in the history of Israel, of those who waxed valiant in fight, and turned to flight the armies of the aliens; or, "laid prostrate their camps." (1 Sam. 11:11. 17:53. 2 Kings 7:) Yet it has generally been supposed, that there is a peculiar reference to the successes of Judas Maccabeus and his brethren, against the forces of Antiochus Epiphanes; when from feeble beginnings they arrived at great power, and defeated all that persecutor's devices, by faith in the promises and protection of the Lord.—While we make a decided difference between the word of God and all other writings; there seems no impropriety in supposing that the apostle had these events in his view, on this occasion: as the historical facts respecting the persecutions of Antiochus and the victories of the Maccabees, were well known among the Hebrews; and really formed an illustrious example of the efficacy and nature of faith.

V. 35—38. Through the same powerful principle of faith, as exercised by the prophets, and the other persons concerned, women had received their dead children raised to life again. (Notes, 1 Kings 17:17—24. 2 Kings 4:13—37.) Others were tortured with all the horrid ingenuity which their cruel persecutors could exercise; and yet refused to "accept of deliverance" from their agonies, when offered them, on condition that they would commit idolatry. They rather chose to expire in their torture, than to purchase life on such terms: because by faith they expected "a better resurrection," even a resurrection to eternal life; which was far better than being restored from the jaws of death, and living a while longer in this world; and even far better than the resurrections to temporal life before mentioned. This is supposed to refer to the tortures and death of a woman and her seven sons, as recorded in the history of the Maccabees. (2 Mac. 7:)—This is a most decisive testimony of the sacred writer, that his countrymen expected a resurrection to eternal life, and that the word of God warranted that expectation.—Others in different ages had been tried by "cruel mockings," and every kind of indignity and derision; with ignominious and painful scourgings, and with lingering sufferings in bonds and imprisonment: yet by faith they cleaved to God and their duty, amidst all that could be inflicted on them. Thus Micaiah, Jeremiah, and many others had been abused. (Notes, 1 Kings 22:9,26,27. Jer. 20: 26:10—24. 37: 38:) Moreover, several had been stoned to death; and some had even been cruelly sawn asunder, as tradition reported that Isaiah had been. (Notes, 2 Kings 21:16. Is. 1:1.) Others had been tempted with the most complicated sufferings, and with conditional offers of deliverance, to sin against God. Some were slain at once with the sword; whilst others were driven from their habitations, to wander as vagabonds, covered with undressed skins instead of suitable raiment; and to inhabit mountains, deserts, dens, and caves, instead of commodious houses; being destitute of friends, afflicted by complicated distresses, and most cruelly tortured, when they fell into the hands of their persecutors. Yet they still trusted in God, and obeyed him, with unremitting patience and constancy, in a realizing belief of his promises of support, comfort, and eternal salvation, and an unwavering confidence in them. Of these excellent persons "the world" which used them with such contempt and cruelty, "was not worthy;" and therefore they were soon removed, in mercy to them, and in judgment to their enemies. The cases of David, Elijah, and many others, recorded in Scripture, may be alluded to: but doubtless many others occurred, during the persecuting reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel, of which particular accounts have not reached us; though some records or traditions concerning them might be extant among the Hebrews when the apostle wrote. V. 39, 40. All the persons above enumerated had "obtained a good report" in the church, and most of them had been mentioned with honour in the word of God, though the world abhorred and execrated them: but "faith" was that peculiarity by which they were distinguished from other men, both in respect of acceptance with God, and as the powerful principle of their zealous obedience, their patient sufferings, or their remarkable exploits and deliverances. Yet "they received not the promise," which their faith especially embraced; they did not live to see the accomplishment of the promise concerning the Messiah, "in whom all nations should be blessed," which was the grand promise made to Abraham; though they were saved by the anticipated efficacy of his sacrifice. For God, in his wise and righteous sovereignty, had reserved some better thing for his church under the Christian dispensation; (Notes, Matt. 13:16,17. Luke 10:23, 24.) that these ancient believers might not be complete, in their salvation and felicity, except in and by Jesus Christ, and by sharing those benefits which were at length more openly revealed to his people: that so the whole church, by union with Christ, might be perfected in one body, and not in separate divisions; though the members of it had been scattered, as it were, through all the ages and nations of the earth. (Eph. 1:10.)—Various interpretations have been given of this passage. Some suppose that the promise was that of "the better country," which the patriarchs desired; (Note, 13—16.) but unto which they were not admitted, nor will be admitted, till the whole multitude of heirs shall be collected together at the end of the world. Others perceiving that this interpretation is contrary to the general current of Scripture, which uniformly declares, that the "righteous entereth into rest;" that "it is better to depart to be with Christ;" and that "when absent from the body believers are present with the Lord;" "blessed are the dead, who die in the Lord, &c." confine the meaning almost wholly to deliverance from persecution!—But was not the promise of a Redeemer, from the first fall of Adam, the grand promise to fallen man? (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. 12:1—3. 49:10.) This "promise" the patriarchs received, and cordially embraced in faith; (17) but they did not live to obtain the thing promised. They were indeed saved by faith in a Redeemer, who was to come; but without those events, which the apostles testified as already past, their pardon and acceptance could not be ratified, or their salvation perfected. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) Thus the Old Testament believers could not be perfected, except by communion with the New Testament church, in the promised Saviour, and his righteousness, atonement, and intercession. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 7:26—28. 10:3,4. Rom. 3:21—26.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The wisdom and goodness of God are peculiarly manifested in the appointment of "faith," to be both the recipient of Christ for justification, and the efficacious principle of our obedience: and, in neither case, will any thing avail, but that faith which gives the soul, as it were, an appropriating hold of "things hoped for," and an internal demonstration of "things not seen."—As men easily remove, and raise to a great height, immense bodies, by means of proper engines, which could not otherwise be done at all; so faith exercised on the promises, truth, power, and perfections of God, would enable a feeble sinner to remove a mountain, if that were necessary for his safety and advantage. (Notes, Matt. 21:21,22. Mark 11:22—26.) Without this, no man, since Adam's fall, has "obtained a good report," or done any real and acceptable "good works," according to the standard of the sacred word. Indeed, in all respects, the worthies of the church are very different from the admired characters of the world.—We know nothing to good purpose, concerning the perfections or works of God; or the eternal state, except by this "evidence of things not seen:" men's reasonings produce amusing speculations; but "the sure testimony of God," received by faith brings satisfaction to the soul. While we credit his account of the creation; we learn to adore and obey the Creator, with humble, thankful, and admiring hearts; which philosophers, in general, with a few honourable exceptions, ancient and modern, have scarcely appeared to do: and those few were led to do it, not by philosophy, but by believing the word of God.—Faith, indeed, receives the testimony of God concerning his creating and providential wisdom, power, and goodness; yet his truths and promises, respecting redemption, constitute its peculiar province. Believing his testimony concerning the future judgment and the eternal world; and even more than believing that we are sinners exposed to condemnation, and deserving of it, according to the tenor of his righteous law; we gladly receive the truth, concerning salvation by grace, through the atoning blood of the divine Saviour: and wait on him for pardon and every blessing, as "his gift through Jesus Christ." (Notes, Rom. 6:21—23. 1 John 5:11,12.) Thus we are enabled "by faith" to plead a far more excellent sacrifice, and to present more acceptable worship, than any Pharisee or infidel can offer unto God, according to the vain devices of a proud impenitent heart: we obtain the "testimony of God," in his word, and by his Spirit, that our persons and services are accepted with him: and, however we may be persecuted, or driven out of the world, our felicity will be sure; and we shall long to declare to all around us, and to leave it upon record for those who shall come after, that this is the only way to heaven, and that we are exceedingly thankful for having been taught to walk in it. (Notes, 1 John 5:19—21.) It would be madness for us to expect to escape the pangs of death, as Enoch and Elijah did; but we may hope to be with God, when no longer found on earth: as having "pleased him" by coming in faith to his mercy-seat, desiring his favour as our portion, and not only believing that "he is," but that he is the gracious "Rewarder," even of sinners, "who diligently seek him;" for "without this faith it is impossible to please God."—If we possess this "evidence of things not seen," we shall hear, with great interest, the warnings of the oracles of God, concerning the future and eternal misery of the ungodly; we shall reverence the denunciation which unbelievers deride, object to, or blaspheme; we shall be "moved with fear to flee from the wrath to come;" we shall be encouraged in hope to make Christ our Refuge, and to leave all other things as comparatively worthless, to seek admission into this ark. Thus we shall be safe, during the troubles of life, the terrors of death, and the solemnities of judgment, when "the wicked shall be turned into hell, even all the people that forget God:" and we may, in the mean time, hope to be the instruments of saving our beloved children and relatives also. But then we must be contented to bear the reproach of singularity, enthusiasm, or hypocrisy; we must be unfashionable; and the world will condemn us, if our profession and behaviour "condemn the world:" (Note, John 7:3—10.) and this will certainly be the case, if we "become heirs of the righteousness which is by faith." We may, however, by faith foresee the time when our revilers will wish, but wish in vain, that they were with us in the despised ark.

V. 8—19. That is not justifying faith which does not obey the command, as well as rely on the promise of God. We too are called to leave many of our worldly connexions, interests, and comforts, to go in quest of a future inheritance; and if heirs of Abraham's faith we shall "obey," and "go forth not knowing" "what things may befall us," or whither the Lord may lead us; we shall wait in the way of duty for the performance of his promises; we shall not take up our rest in the world, or be satisfied with its most splendid accommodations; but we shall "seek for a city which hath foundations," whose Architect and Founder is the LORD of hosts. Indeed, our faith will not be always alike vigorous and efficacious; and its waverings will show that we are not saved for it, though by it: yet, upon recollection, "judging him faithful, who hath promised," we shall be strengthened to expect the blessing, in defiance of apparent difficulties and supposed impossibilities; and thus shall be enabled to perform whatever is connected with obtaining the promises. If indeed we professed to seek a portion in the world, the advantages of religion might appear dubious: but we avow ourselves to be "strangers" in a foreign land, and on our pilgrimage to our desired home, where "our treasure and our hearts already are." We have not yet received the blessings, but we "see them afar off, embrace them, and wait in hope" for the accomplishment of the promises: and we profess to be satisfied with the life of a sojourner and a pilgrim, and to wait till after death for our felicity. If, like apostates, we were minded to "return to the country whence we came out;" we might "find an opportunity" of doing it, perhaps with some secular advantage: but faith shows us that it is devoted to destruction, with all those who choose their inheritance in it. We therefore "desire a better country, that is, a heavenly;" and as God has prepared everlasting mansions for us, in the city of his special abode, in which he will make us most blessed for evermore; so his glory in our salvation, and our wisdom in choosing him for our Portion, will be most manifest in the event, whatever present appearances may be. This faith "endures to the end;" we must live by it and die in it; and then have its expectations answered, and far exceeded. Whilst we live, our faith must be repeatedly and sharply tried, that we may be distinguished from mere professors of Christianity; but we may expect that we shall be strengthened in proportion to the trial: nor can we reasonably doubt of the power of faith, to produce the most unreserved obedience, when we remember that by this principle "Abraham, when tried, offered his beloved Isaac" as a burnt-offering at God's command; and trusted in him to perform all those promises, which his obedience seemed about for ever to render vain, and their fulfilment impossible. Let us then inquire how far our faith has produced similar obedience, when we have been called to acts of inferior self-denial, or to make inferior sacrifices to our duty: and whether we have given up what was called for, in an unreserved confidence that the Lord would make up all our losses, and even bless us by means of the most afflictive dispensations. For, as "He spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him freely give us all things?" And what should we deem too valuable to give up, at the call of such a merciful and bounteous Benefactor?

V. 20—31. While we desire, in faith, to "bless our children" and worship God during life, and at the approach of death, and afterwards to have our lot with his people in the heavenly Canaan; and while we attend to every relative duty, trusting in the Lord, and "not fearing the wrath" of man: let us particularly note the effects of the faith of Moses: and ask ourselves, whether we have been influenced to a similar judgment, choice, and experience. Have we, "by faith," learned to prefer the sanctified "affliction of the people of God," to "the enjoyment of the pleasures of sin for a season?" Do we deem it an honour and a privilege to be "reproached for the sake of Christ;" and to prefer loss in his cause, to the riches of this evil world; having "respect to the great reward" promised to those who are thus distinguished? All believers are not called to make the same sacrifices, or to endure the same trials, "for righteousness' sake;" nor have all the same measure of faith: yet without some experience and consciousness of this kind, we are not warranted to conclude that we are of Moses's religion: for a common walking-stick more resembles Aaron's fruitful rod, than the faith of many modern professors of evangelical truth does the self-denying faith of Moses or of Abraham.—But the subject is absolutely inexhaustible: we must by faith "overcome" the fear of man, as well as the love of the world; we must endure all sufferings, and venture all consequences, in the way of duty, "as seeing Him who is invisible." In all things our faith must respect the true paschal "Lamb, and the sprinkling of his blood," for deliverance from the destruction of the wicked; and we must conscientiously observe his ordinances, as means of grace to our souls. Then, by faith we may pass, at God's command, through seas of tribulation, and scenes of temptation or danger, during life and at death; in which all unbelievers must sink and perish for ever.—By faith we must implicitly use every means, however unlikely, which God prescribes in order to our obtaining the promises; trusting in him alone to render them effectual: nor will any perish with the enemies of God, who believe his word, and show it by love to his people; whatever former crimes they have committed, or in whatever situation they may be found.

V. 32—40. "Faith" will enable a man to serve God, and his generation, in whatever way he may be employed, whether in governing or reforming nations, or defending them, by crushing the power of iniquitous assailants; or in preaching the gospel, and boldly testifying against the crimes of the most mighty and implacable of its opposers; or by "working righteousness," and obtaining promises in a more obscure station. It will influence a man to such prompt obedience, disinterested diligence, and warranted expectation, as will ensure all needful success in his undertakings. It will also prepare him for facing any dangers: and though we do not now expect to "stop the mouths of lions," or to "quench the violence of the fire;" yet we are authorized to look for proportionable supports and consolations, if called to end our pilgrimage by the hand of violence. But we are chiefly concerned in the spiritual warfare: and in this, "by faith, we shall out of weakness be made strong, wax valiant in fight, and put to flight the armies of the aliens."—Though we do not hope to have "our dead restored again to life" in this world; yet faith will mingle joy with our tears over them; and teach us to "refuse deliverance" from suffering by sin, whilst we hope for "the better resurrection" which God has promised to his people. "Trials of cruel mockings" we may expect, even in these favoured days; though hitherto ex

Exhortations to constancy, patience, and diligence, deduced from the abundant testimony of former believers, from the example of Christ, and from the loving intent and salutary effect of the Lord's corrections, 1—13; to peace and holiness, and to jealous watchfulness over ourselves, and each other, enforced by the case of Esau, 14—17; to an obedient reception of the gospel, and reverential worship of God, from the superior excellency of the Christian dispensation, and the proportionably greater guilt and danger of neglecting it, 18—29.

WHEREFORE, [a]seeing we also are compassed about with so great [b]a cloud [c]of witnesses, [d]let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, [e]and let us run [g]with patience the race that is set before us,

2 [h]Looking unto Jesus [i]the [k]Author and [k]Finisher of our faith; who, [l]for the joy that was set before him, [m]endured the cross, [n]despising the shame, [o]and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.

3 For [p]consider him that endured such [q]contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.

4 Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin.

5 And ye have forgotten the exhortation which speaketh unto you as unto children, My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him:

6 For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.

7 If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not?

8 But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons.

9 Furthermore we have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live?

10 For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness.

11 Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby.

12 Wherefore lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees;

13 And make straight paths for your feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way; but let it rather be healed.

14 Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord:

15 Looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled;

16 Lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright.

17 For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.

18 For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness, and darkness, and tempest,

19 And the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard entreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more:

20 (For they could not endure that which was commanded, And if so much as a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned, or thrust through with a dart:

21 And so terrible was the sight, that Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake:)

22 But ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels,

23 To the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect,

24 And to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel.

25 See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven:

26 Whose voice then shook the earth: but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven.

27 And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain.

28 Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear:

29 For our God is a consuming fire.

empted from scourgings, bonds, and imprisonments. We seem not to have immediate cause to apprehend being "stoned, or sawn asunder, or slain by the sword:" yet we shall surely be "tempted;" and we cannot overcome temptation, except by that faith which supported the martyrs, and made them more than conquerors over the fear of torment and death. If then we are ready to shrink, or droop, under our lighter trials; let us think of those excellent men, of whom "the world was not worthy:" and reflect how "destitute, afflicted, and tormented" they were; and how they were driven out, and wandered as outcasts "in mountains and dens and caves of the earth." For as our advantages, "with those better things which God hath provided for us," are so much superior to theirs; so should our "obedience of faith, and patience of hope, and labour of love," be more distinguished. Let us then pray continually for the increase of our faith, that we may follow these illustrious examples, and be with them at length made perfect in holiness and felicity, and "shine like the sun in the kingdom of our Father" for evermore.

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1. The apostle next called on the Hebrews, to consider themselves as "encompassed about with witnesses," who bore their combined and most decided testimony to the faithfulness of God, and to the power and efficacy of faith, as innumerable as the drops of water in a cloud. The persons before mentioned, and multitudes besides, seemed to look down from heaven, or even to come from thence, to surround them, and to bear testimony in the cause; as well as to be spectators of their conduct, in that arduous, perilous, and honourable race, in which they themselves had got so blessed a victory. Professed Christians ought therefore with one consent, to "lay aside every weight;" (as men laid aside their superfluous garments, or more costly ornaments, when about to run in the Isthmian games, or to contend in the race on any occasion;) and not to burden themselves with worldly cares, interests, or indulgences; idolatrous attachments, or needless hurry of business, which might hinder their spiritual progress, and cause them to loiter, to move heavily, or to look back, and so to endanger the loss of the race. They should also watch against, and seek a decided victory over, natural depravity and evil habits; which would still continually "beset them," and take advantage, so to speak, of every favourable circumstance; and especially of those sinful propensities, which on any account had a peculiar power against them. In particular, they ought to use every means of conquering unbelief; through which they were tempted to apostatize, from love of the world, and fear of suffering. This was "the sin which most easily beset them," in those times of persecution; many had been cast down by it, many more were in danger, and they all would doubtless be vigorously assaulted on that side. It behooved them, therefore, to get rid of every incumbrance, and to seek the increase of their faith, and the crucifixion of their worldly lusts; that they might "press forward," with progressive earnestness, and unwearied patience, in the persevering obedience of faith in Christ. This was "the race set before them," in which they must either win the crown of glory, or have everlasting misery and ignominy for their portion. It does not appear that this word is ever used, either in Scripture, or in Greek writers, to denote a spectator simply; except as he was one prepared to testify what he had seen. So that the testimony of the multitude of ancient believers to the truths insisted on, and not that they or others are spectators of our conduct, is perhaps exclusively meant.—Which doth so easily beset us.] Ευπεριστατον. Here only.

V. 2, 3. The apostle had called the Hebrews to contemplate the conduct of those who in former times had patiently run the race; and to consider the perils, difficulties, and sufferings, through which they had urged their course, "by faith" to seize the incorruptible prize: and they ought to realize their presence, as witnesses for Christ, or spectators of their conflict. But they must "look off," not only from the vainglory of the world, the number and power of their enemies, and their own weakness and sinfulness; but even from these inferior luminaries, that they might behold that glorious "Sun," from which even those received all the light that rendered them so resplendent. (Note, John 1:16.) In order to their more full instruction and encouragement, they must look steadily to Jesus; not merely as One who had run his glorious race, and completed his work, by faith in the promises and covenant engagements of the Father; but as "the Author and Finisher of faith" itself. He alone had opened the way for men to return to God and to enter heaven, "by faith;" when sin had closed for ever that of personal righteousness: from him, as the great Prophet of the church, the doctrine of faith had been delivered from the beginning, and perfected in the revelation made by the gospel: and this none would ever be authorized to change, add to, or deduct from. He alone, by his Spirit, produces "faith" in the hearts of his people, which he maintains, increases, and perfects, in its nature and fruits, till its work be finished. So that, they must look to him for faith, as well as by faith. He indeed did not want that faith, by which a sinner is justified; yet "in finishing his work" on earth, he led his people the way to complete victory over every enemy, by a patient, obedient reliance on the word of his heavenly Father. (Note, Ps. 16:8—11.) As he had "in all things the pre-eminence;" so he did not enter into his mediatorial glory, without having the precedency in the measure of his sufferings, above all others who ever went to heaven. "For the joy set before him," of his own personal exaltation to the mediatorial throne; of the salvation of countless millions of lost sinners from destruction; of bringing them to endless happiness; and of eternally glorifying the whole Name, and all the perfections of God; (Notes, Matt. 25:19—23. John 17:22,23.) he, with the utmost fortitude and constancy, endured all his other humiliating sufferings, from his birth in the stable to his agony in the garden; and at length most willingly submitted to be suspended on the cross, and there to expire in lingering tortures. Though this method of execution was peculiarly ignominious, and by the law pronounced accursed; and though his crucifixion was attended with unheard of circumstances of indignity, outrage, revilings, and derision; yet he disregarded and even "despised the shame," as well as the anguish of it, as not worthy to be compared with the glorious event which he had in full view. Thus, having "endured" until his undertaking was finished, he was speedily raised from the dead, and exalted to "the right hand of the throne of God." (Notes, 1:3,4. 8:1, 2.) The disciples ought therefore to look unto him, both as an example of constancy and patience; as the Author of their strength, encouragement, victory, and salvation; and as a glorious instance of the blessed effect of perseverance, amidst reproaches and sufferings, in cleaving unto God and being "faithful unto death." This case was so extraordinary, that they would do well to "consider it," even with arithmetical exactness, and to estimate the dignity and excellency of the sufferer; "the contradiction of sinners" against him, who ensnared, reviled, opposed, and accused him, with most perverse enmity against his holy doctrine and example, and with malignant ingratitude for all his love; the intenseness and variety of his sufferings; the meek and composed fortitude with which he endured them; the love, which moved him thus to suffer, and the most blessed consequences of his humiliation. When they began to grow "weary and faint in their minds," with trials and injuries from their malicious persecutors, such considerations would serve to quiet and encourage them: whilst they recollected, that the holy Jesus suffered to save them from deserved and eternal misery; and that sinners of the same nature with themselves inflicted these tortures; that he had much bitterness in his cup, which was not in theirs; (Notes, Matt. 26:36—39. John 1:29. Gal. 6:11—14.) that he was hated for his own sake, and they only because of their relation to him; and that his cross secured a happy event to all their conflicts and trials in his cause. In short, by "looking to him," every kind of humiliating and animating topic would occur to their minds, to invigorate the exercise of their holy affections, and to repress every corrupt propensity.

V. 4—8. The Hebrews had indeed suffered the loss of property, and even bonds and scourgings, for cleaving to Christ; (Note, 10:32—34.) and in maintaining their personal conflict against sin and temptation, and the contest of the whole army of Christ against the common cause of sin and Satan. They, however, whom the sacred writer addressed, had not yet "resisted unto blood." Many of their brethren had chosen to die in this conflict, rather than yield the victory to their enemies, by renouncing the gospel: even men of like infirmities with themselves, had endured more, by faith in the cause of God, than they had been called to do, and their sufferings for Christ were unspeakably less, than his for them had been: so that they ought to be ashamed of their cowardice, if they grew weary, or fainted in the contest, because of their inferior trials. (Notes, 2:3. Job 4:3—6. Prov. 24:10. 2 Cor. 4:1,2,13—18. Gal. 6:6—10.) It would in that case appear that they had "forgotten the exhortation" of the Lord, who, by Solomon, addressed believers as his children, when he called on them not to "despise his chastening," nor yet to "faint" under it. (Notes, Job 5:17. Prov. 3:11,12.) Whatever instrument was employed; they were thus taught to recognise the fatherly correction of God, in their trials; and neither to disregard them, with stoutness of spirit, and unfeeling contempt, as if they called for no humiliation, were capable of no improvement, had no meaning, and were easily supported; nor yet to faint, despond, turn aside, or seek relief by sin, when suffering under them. For the Lord corrects all the objects of his love; and "scourgeth every one, whom he receiveth" as his adopted child, into his family, and distinguishes by his peculiar regard. If then they endured their afflictions as fatherly chastisements, in a submissive spirit and with due constancy; it would evidently appear that the Lord was "dealing with them as with children!" for indeed, among men, it might be inquired, "What son is he whom his father" on no occasion "chasteneth?" All need correction; all who are properly educated receive it; no wise and kind father entirely withholds it; and no children are wholly exempted from the pain of salutary discipline, except such as are indulged to their ruin. (Notes, Prov. 13:24. 19:18. 22:15. 23:13,14. 29:15,17.) So that, if the professed people of God were not at all corrected, it might be inferred, that he did not own them as his children, but considered them as spurious; members of the visible church, but not "born of the Spirit," or educated for the "inheritance of the saints." (Note, Gal. 4:21—31.)—The allusion may either be made to such children, as a man deems to be spurious, though born of his wife; because he suspects her of having been unfaithful, and therefore he will bestow no pains about them; or such as the real father neglects, because they are illegitimate, and he is ashamed to own them: (Notes, Judg. 9:11:1,2.) but the former case seems more exactly to accord to the apostle's intent. My son, &c. (5) The quotation is almost exactly from the Septuagint; which does not materially vary from the Hebrew.

V. 9—11. "The fathers according to the flesh," of those whom the apostle addressed, had corrected them in their younger years: and though the chastisement "seemed grievous" to them; yet they did not leave them on that account, but rather learned to stand in awe of their authority, and to fear giving them further offence: and, when they were grown up, they became sensible, that this discipline had been productive of great good to them. Was it not therefore much more proper for them to submit to "the Father of spirits," the Creator of their souls, and the Giver of spiritual life; (Marg. Ref. i.) when that subjection was essentially connected with their salvation, and nothing but death eternal could be the consequence of their rebelling against him? For indeed the corrections of their earthly parents, during the few days of their childhood, had been inflicted "after their own pleasure;" and were often, in a great degree, the effect of their own passions, rather than of a prudent design for the good of the children; but their heavenly Father corrected them, though with apparent severity, during the short time of their continuance on earth: entirely with a wise and faithful regard to their profit; and in order to make them "partakers of his holiness," by mortifying their pride and carnal lusts, and bringing them, through such discipline, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, to be conformed to himself in judgment, dispositions, and conduct. By these means, he showed them the vanity of the world, the evil nature and effects of sin, the depravity of their own hearts, and the preciousness of his salvation; and so trained them up to humility, spirituality, simplicity, tenderness, submission, love, reverence, gratitude, compassion, and every holy affection. Now they ought not to suppose, that these salutary corrections ever appeared pleasant, or "matter of joy," to the persons who were enduring them: on the contrary, they always seemed for the present, "a source of grief," and caused much anguish; nor could they otherwise answer the intention. So that the sufferers often thought their trials did them harm, and would end in their ruin: yet afterwards, when the tumult of their passions had subsided, and they were able to deliberate on the instructions which they received under them; they were convinced that they amply compensated for the anguish, by "yielding the peaceable fruits of righteousness," and bringing them into a disposition, quietly to submit to God, and meekly to bear the injuries of men; and by rendering them fruitful in all those "good works," which evinced them to be justified, and at peace with God, and which tended to give them inward peace, joy, and confidence in him. Thus having been "exercised," disciplined, or instructed, by sanctified afflictions: they would afterwards possess the benefit of them, when the pain was over; even though at the time they seemed to irritate their corrupt passions, and tended immediately to make a discovery of the evils of their hearts, for their subsequent humiliation.

V. 12, 13. The considerations above insisted on should induce the Hebrews, both in respect of themselves, and of each other, to observe the counsel of the prophet. (Note, Is. 35:3,4.)—They should endeavour to counteract every disposition to faint, despond, or renounce the profession of the gospel, because of persecutions: considering them as fatherly corrections for their profit, submitting to them as such, and seeking to have them sanctified; and directing and encouraging each other to take the same course. Thus they ought patiently and firmly to maintain their profession, and go on in the path of holy obedience; and, by proper instructions, admonitions, and counsels, to oppose every false doctrine, and remove every stumblingblock. Thus "straight paths" might be made "for their feet," though the road itself was rough and thorny; lest any of those who were discouraged, or who, like lame persons, proceeded with difficulty and pain, should be turned out of the way, to seek an easier path, by concealing or acting inconsistently with their profession. (Note, Is 57:14.) On the contrary, care should be taken that such persons might be "healed," and confirmed by suitable encouragements and cautions, whilst there remained any hope concerning them.—Lift up, &c.] The quotation is rather from the Hebrew than the Septuagint; which is, "Be strong, ye hands which hang down, and ye fainting knees."

V. 14. Whilst the persons addressed, thus steadfastly adhered to the truth, and contended for it; it was also incumbent on them to avoid all discord and resentment, "and to pursue peace with all men," even though it seemed to flee from them. They ought, as far as truth and duty would permit, to live peaceably with Jews and Gentiles, and to bear or concede every thing for that purpose; and they should study to be at peace with each other, and with their Gentile brethren. This would greatly aid them in "following after holiness," and in seeking nearer conformity to the spiritual law and perfect character of God, as exhibited in the example of Christ: nor must they even "seek peace," so as to neglect the practice and pursuit of holiness, or by connivance at sin: "for without holiness no man," of any religion, "could see the Lord." None could behold his manifested glory, and commune with him in comfort, whilst in this world, without "the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience;" nor could any one be capable of the beatific vision hereafter, or admitted to it, without being made "holy even as God is holy."—It should be noted, that humiliation, brokenness of heart, and proper affections towards the Lord Jesus, are essential to the holiness of a redeemed sinner; and all else, however specious, must be counterfeit, where these are wanting. (Notes, Ps. 16:8—11. Matt. 5:8. 1 Cor. 13:8—12. Jam. 3:13—18. 1 John 3:1—3. Rev. 21:22—27.)

V. 15—17. It behooved Christians "to look diligently," both to themselves, and likewise to each other, in respect of their principles and conduct; "lest any one should fail" of an interest in the special mercy and favour of God, or remain destitute of his sanctifying grace, and so be left to apostatize: (Notes, 3:7—13. 4:1,2. 10:19—22.) and lest "any root of bitterness," any unmortified lust in the heart, which seemed to be dead, should spring up and shoot forth its bitter and poisonous produce, in heretical doctrines, or scandalous practices, to the trouble and disturbance of the whole body, and the defiling and corrupting of numbers; as frequently had been done. (Notes, Deut. 29:18—20. 1 Cor. 5:6—13. 15:31—34. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 3:6—9.) For instance, lest any one among them should commit fornication, under a mistaken notion of Christian liberty: or lest there should be some "profane" person, who so despised the peculiar blessings of the new covenant, as to barter them away for temporal advantages; like Esau, who for one meal of meat sold his birthright. (Notes, Gen. 25:30—34.) That example ought to be a warning to them, not to renounce Christianity for the sake of worldly ease, interest, or indulgence; for when Esau "afterwards willed to inherit the blessing, he was rejected," both by the Lord, and by his father Isaac. (Notes, Gen. 27:33—42.) Thus he found no place or opportunity "for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears." The whole history of Esau shows, that he, at that time at least, neither truly repented of all his sins, nor sought to do it. But he was grieved and vexed at being circumvented by Jacob; he was sorry that he had made so foolish a bargain; he coveted the temporal advantages which belonged to the birthright, especially the dominion over his brother; he had altered his mind in that particular, and he sought carefully, and with tears, to induce Isaac to alter his purpose, to retract Jacob's blessing, and to bestow it on him; but he sought this in vain, for it was then too late. The latter, however, even the change of mind in Isaac, which might induce him to retract the blessing pronounced on Jacob, and to confer it on him, seems to be the repentance which Esau sought with tears.—Thus the time would shortly come, when they, who refused spiritual blessings for the sake of temporal interests, would become fully sensible of their madness and folly; and would be glad to reverse the fatal bargain; but "that must be let alone for ever." This was another awful warning against apostacy, but it has no relation to the case of those who earnestly desire and pray for repentance. (Notes, 6:4—8. 10:26—31.)

V. 18—21. The apostle again returned to his former position, that the superior excellency of the Christian dispensation would render it proportionably more criminal and perilous to reject it; for his discourse was equally suited to warn avowed unbelievers, and those who were tempted to apostacy. (Notes, 2:1—4. 6:4—8. 10:28—31.) He did not speak of the state of individuals, as converted or unconverted; but of the different method, in which God now spake to the nation, from that in which he delivered the law to their fathers. This he showed by an allusion to the two mountains, Sinai and Zion. (Note, Gal. 4:21—31.) For, though God at length spake to his people from mount Zion and the mercy-seat, through the atonements and ministrations of the high-priest; this was only in a typical and obscure manner: (Notes, 7:—9: 10:1—18.) "the way into the holiest was not made manifest" under that dispensation; but the law was delivered from mount Sinai, and the national covenant was there ratified. (Notes, Ex. 19:5. 24:) That dispensation, however, was at length abolished, and another introduced. The Lord therefore did not now call them to assemble, and hear him speak to them from the material mountain, which was capable of being touched, (though their fathers had been forbidden to touch it,) from whence most tremendous displays of the divine glory had been made, when the law was given, and the terrors attending on it made the people entreat, that Jehovah would no more speak to them in that way; as "they could not endure the things which were spoken." (Notes, Ex. 19:10—24. 20:18—20. Deut. 4:13. 5:28,29.) Indeed the severe restraints laid on them, and the terrible things seen and heard by them, filled them with dismay; and even made Moses exclaim, that "he exceedingly feared and quaked;" notwithstanding his typical office of mediator, his peculiar sanctity, and the long and intimate communion with God which he had maintained. (Note, Ex. 19:16—20.)—The whole of the scene showed the impossibility of a sinner's coming before God with acceptance, according to the works of the law, the highly criminal presumption of attempting it, and the need of a Mediator and a better covenant: and it was to the apostle's purpose, to call off the attention of the Hebrews, from that dispensation to the gospel, by every argument and illustration which could be fairly made to bear on the subject.

24 And to [c]Jesus the Mediator of the [d]new covenant, and [e]to the blood of sprinkling, that [f]speaketh better things than that of Abel.

25 [g]See that ye [h]refuse not him that speaketh. For [i]if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we [k]turn away from him that speaketh from heaven:

26 Whose [l]voice then shook the earth: but now he hath promised, saying, [m]Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven.

V. 22—25. The Hebrew converts to Christianity ought to consider themselves as summoned by the preachers of the gospel to come to "mount Zion," or as actually convened there, to hear the voice of God from the mercy-seat. They were, professedly, become inhabitants of "the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem," the place of the Lord's special residence with his covenant people and accepted worshippers, of which Jerusalem had been a type: at least they were invited to enter, and become citizens of that favoured city. This meant the church of Christ on earth, with all its special privileges, ordinances, and promises; as connected with the holy residence of God in heaven, and as continually transmitting to it new inhabitants. (Notes, Is. 12:4—6. Gal. 4:21—31. Rev. 11:1,2. 14:1—5. 21:9—27.) They were also called to hear the voice of God, in the presence of an "innumerable company of angels," or, "ten thousands of angels." These were all "spirits sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation," who were invited to participate their happiness, and to join and emulate their worship. (Note, 1:13,14.)—Moreover, Christians were come to unite, not with the congregation of Israel, but with "the assembly and church of the first-born," those who were specially devoted to God; his children, and heirs of the heavenly inheritance. (Notes, Ex. 4:22,23. 13:2. Num. 3:41—43. Rom. 8:28—31. Col. 1:15—17.) Their names were not indeed always enrolled in the genealogies or registers of the Lord's people on earth; but "they were written in heaven," as the elect of God, born of the Spirit, denizens of that heavenly city, and entitled to all its invaluable immunities. (Marg. Ref. z.)—They were also called, and in profession come, to hear the voice of that God, as a Saviour and a Father, who was the impartial, omniscient, omnipotent, and righteous "Judge of all," and by whom all unbelievers would be condemned to everlasting punishment: yea, they were invited to share the blessedness of "the spirits of just men made perfect;" even of all the company of ancient believers, and of those who had died since the coming of Christ, and had thus been made perfect in holiness and felicity.—This is a most decisive proof, that the souls of believers enter into a state of perfect happiness when they die, as far as it can consist with their state of separation from the body.—Christians were also convened, as it were, to hear the voice of God, speaking to them by "Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant." This was founded on better promises, and ratified by nobler blood, than the covenant mediated by Moses: even by the shedding of that blood, through the application of which, the conscience, the heart, and the duties of sinners were cleansed, and "the heavenly things themselves were purified;" of which all the sprinklings of blood under the law had been mere shadows. (Notes, 9:11—26. 10:1—22. 13:20,21.) Not only was this blood more efficacious than that of bulls and goats; but Jesus, by it, having died and risen again, spake far better things than righteous Abel had done: (Note, 11:4.) for, while the blood of Abel called from the ground for vengeance on the murderer; the blood of Christ, applied in faith, not only took away the guilt of all other sins, however atrocious, but even that of being his crucifiers; as multitudes of the Hebrews, especially, who had been immediately concerned in that most tremendous crime, could thankfully witness. The national guilt of Israel, therefore, could not preclude them from pardon, through this great atonement; and the Lord invited and commanded them to believe in the name of his Son, and so to share all the before-mentioned inestimable privileges. Let them therefore see to it, as they valued his favour, and feared his vengeance, that they did not "refuse" the gracious call and proffered salvation of him, who thus spake to them from his "throne of grace," and by "his beloved Son." For if those who refused to obey the voice of God speaking to them on earth, from mount Sinai, by Moses, but rejected his authority and brake his covenant, did not escape condign punishment; much more certainly and severely would those be punished, who turned away, with enmity and contempt, from him who now spake to them from heaven, by the ambassadors of his Son, their Mediator and High-Priest in the sanctuary above: (Note, Prov. 1:32,33.) for their guilt and condemnation must be proportioned to the grace and condescension which they refused and despised. (Notes, 2:1—4. Matt. 3:7—12. John 3:19—21.)—This plainly shows, that by "coming to mount Zion, &c." the apostle did not mean being true believers; but having the gospel proposed to them, or having made a profession of it. They might therefore be said to "refuse," and to "turn away" from God, whether they rejected his invitation, or after a time became apostates from Christianity: but men cannot be said to refuse what was never proposed to them.

V. 26—29. The voice of JEHOVAH, from mount Sinai, had been attended with tremendous earthquakes and convulsions: but many ages after that transaction, in an express prediction of the Messiah, God had foretold that he would "once more shake the earth and the heavens also;" (Note, Hag. 2:6—9.) meaning that he would unhinge the whole civil and ecclesiastical state of the Jews, and abolish the Mosaic dispensation, in order to make way for the kingdom of Christ. The expression, "once more," as referring to the change in the state of the church and the world, which took place by the introduction of the Mosaic dispensation, with the extraordinary events attending that change; and to all other subsequent convulsions of the nation; and looking forward to the still more extraordinary changes, to be introduced at the coming of the Messiah, denoted the total removal of the things shaken, as "of things made," and constituted after the manner of this lower creation, to endure but for a time. (Notes, Matt. 24:29—35. Mark 13:24—31. Acts 2:14—21.) This "shaking," however, was to be only "once more," and then a constitution would be introduced of a heavenly nature, which could not be shaken or "removed," but should continue to the end, and, in its effects, for ever. As, therefore, those who had embraced the gospel were admitted into "a kingdom which could not be removed;" as others were invited to accept of this benefit, according to the dispensation which was now openly introduced: and as all grace was freely promised to every one who sought it in the appointed way; it was proper to exhort all of them "to have," that is, to seek for, and so obtain, and hold fast as a treasure, "grace," that they might serve God, not merely as his professing people, but "acceptably," as true believers and spiritual worshippers. This they ought to do, not only with joy, confidence, and gratitude; but with "reverence" of his majesty and authority, and a holy fear of deceiving themselves, of falling under his wrath or frown, or of dishonouring his name; as humbly conscious of their unworthiness, weakness, and depravity; and recollecting, that the "God," whose people they professed to be, was "a consuming Fire" to destroy hypocrites, apostates, and enemies of every kind, however masked or disguised. (Marg. Ref. r. Note, Nah. 1:2—6.)—The apostle evidently meant some of his expressions for one description of readers, and others for those of a different character; though he left each to make the application to himself: but he peculiarly aimed to convince his countrymen, that unbelievers among them were doomed to the most tremendous vengeance of God, both national and personal; from which there could be no escape, except by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and cleaving to him.—Yet once, &c. (26) The quotation varies both from the Septuagint and the Hebrew. In the latter it is, "Yet once, I will shake the heaven and the earth, &c."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. While prophets, apostles, martyrs, and ancient believers sing the praises of our redeeming God; they unitedly testify to us his faithfulness to his promises, and the inestimable preciousness of his salvation; and they exhort us "to lay aside every weight, and to run with patience the race set before us." We should therefore seriously inquire, what are

"the weights" which retard our course; what the sin or sins by which we are "most easily beset," and peculiarly endangered; that we may seek for grace to enable us to "lay aside the one," and to be upon our guard against all occasions of the other. Many, who seemed to run well, lose the race through the weight of increasing business, prosperity, and affluence, with the peculiar snares, temptations, connexions, and incumbrances, which spring from that source. This seems the easily besetting sin of these days of liberty and peace: but all men, in whatever state, have their peculiar dangers and hinderances against which they are required to watch and pray without ceasing: nor can we "run with patience the race set before us," unless we be crucified to the world, and daily employed in mortifying the whole body of sin, with all its affections and lusts; those especially, to which education, habit, and situation, give most advantage.—We should imagine ourselves surrounded with this "cloud of witnesses," as if spectators of our conduct, animating us to run the race without fainting, and prepared to congratulate our success with adoring acclamations. Yet the eye of our souls should be principally fixed upon "Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our faith;" "from whose fulness they all received," by whose light they shone, and through whose strength they contended, and obtained the victory: and we should turn our attention from all other objects, to fixed contemplation on his ignominious cross, and his glorious throne. The thoughts of the variety of his sufferings, from love to sinners, and his animating example of meekness and patience, cannot fail to exhilarate our drooping spirits, with an assurance of his compassion, and tender regard to our good. We shall then see, that a "joy is set before us" also, at the end of our sorrows, for the sake of which we may cheerfully endure them; we shall perceive that it is reasonable to disregard the reproach and contempt of men, as the divine Saviour bare and sanctified this trial also: and the view of his glorious exaltation will inspire us with confidence in his power to protect, support, and comfort us, under all that we can suffer for his sake, and to "perfect what concerneth us." (Note, Ps. 138:8.) Let us then frequently "consider him, who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be wearied and faint in our minds." What are our little trials to his agonies, or even to our deserts? What indeed are they to the sufferings of many of our brethren, in different ages and places? We have "not yet resisted unto blood," in our warfare against sin, as many others have done: and we should be ashamed of our murmurings and impatience, when we have so very little even apparent reason of complaint. (Note, Jer. 12:5,6.)

V. 5—13. While we "look to Jesus," to reconcile us to suffering, to set us against sin, and to eclipse the vain splendour of this worthless world; we should also learn to receive every affliction, which the malice or envy of men brings upon us, as a correction sent by our wise and gracious Father, who speaketh to us by his word interpreting his providential dispensations, "as to children;" and calls on us neither to "despise his chastisements, nor to faint under" them. We should consider them as precious favours, needful blessings, pledges of love, and the only spiritual good which he has promised to give us, without our praying for it. He never fails to chasten his children; though he often permits hypocrites to remain unmolested, because he means to destroy them. He will neglect the education of none whom he receives into his family; and he sets us an example, how we should correct our children, "not for our pleasure, but for their profit," not from passion, but in wise affection. Thus he "makes us partakers of his holiness," that we may be meet to share his felicity. Let us then endeavour to receive chastening from "the Father of our spirits," as we expect our children to submit to our corrections. These momentary sorrows will be over in a few days: and though for the present they "seem not to be joyous, but grievous;" yet we shall afterwards experience the benefit and comfort of them in "the peaceable fruits of righteousness," which have been produced and matured, by our being exercised with them. Thus medicines yield the pleasant sensations of health, when the nauseous taste is forgotten; and delicious poisons cause extreme agony, when the relish of them is gone for ever. Let us then comfort ourselves and each other with these topics; that we may "lift up the hands which hang down, and confirm the feeble knees:" and let us carefully remove obstacles out of the way of pilgrims, and look well to the weak and tempted; lest they should be turned out of the way; instead of being encouraged to persevere in the course, amidst all its roughness and difficulty.

V. 14—17. To avoid stumblingblocks and offences, we should "follow peace with all men," and leave no proper means untried to avoid contention: which numbers delight to kindle, and blow into a flame. As far as we can go, without sacrificing truth or duty, we shall find, that "peace with men," of all parties and descriptions, will be favourable to our pursuit of holiness; (Note, Rom. 12:17—21.) without which no man of any sect or sentiment can enter heaven; or enjoy the favour of God; or be capable of delighting in him, and his presence, worship, and service. Let us then "look diligently to ourselves," that we be not deceived by notions or forms, and "come short of the grace of God;" and let us watch over each other, that "no root of bitterness" may spring up in our congregations, or families, to disturb the peace of them, and to defile the souls of many. Those lax notions, especially, must be zealously opposed, which give allowance to the flesh, from a perversion of evangelical principles; for "a little of this leaven" will suffice to "leaven a whole lump." All professors of the gospel should remember profane Esau: for they will all be tempted, more or less, to sell their birthright for worldly pleasure or advantage. But the time is at hand, when those, who thus renounce or refuse the salvation of God, for carnal indulgence or interest, would be glad to "inherit the blessing," and will be rejected; no place will be found for reversing the fatal bargain, though they should "seek it carefully with tears;" nor can any one, who wilfully rejects the gospel, or deliberately refuses to comply with its exhortations, for the love of this present world, know to what obduracy and desperation he may be given up, in the righteous judgment of God.

V. 18—29. We have abundant cause for joy and gratitude that we are not left under the terror and curse of the broken covenant of works, or under the darkness of the legal dispensation. The most holy man must "tremble," yea despair, if he were to be judged according to the law given from mount Sinai; and the vengeance of God would be far more tremendous, than "the fire and tempest" there witnessed. But while we bless God, who speaks to us from the mercy-seat, and calls us to partake of the privileges of Zion's citizens, and the happiness of angels and glorified saints, through "Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant," and the sprinkling of his precious blood; let us see to it, that we have good evidence of our "names being written in heaven" with those of true disciples, and not merely on earth with those of professed Christians. Let us remember that our cause must be tried by "God, the Judge of all," who will determine whether we do, or do not, belong to "the church of the first-born:" and let it be noted, that whilst the blood of Jesus speaks nothing but mercy to the most atrocious sinner, who truly believes; it will call for severer vengeance on those who neglect, pervert, or despise it, than that of Abel did on his murderer Cain. Let all then see to it, that "they do not refuse him, who speaketh to them from heaven," with infinite tenderness and love; lest they should fall from a greater height of privilege to a more tremendous depth of condemnation than ancient rebels did: for how can they escape, who turn away from God in unbelief or apostacy, whilst he so graciously "beseeches them to be reconciled to him," and to accept of his everlasting favour?—No other dispensation is now to be introduced, till the consummation of all things; "the kingdom," which we are called to receive, "can never be moved;" the inheritance of believers is secured against all enemies and disasters; all things pertaining to salvation, are freely given in answer to prayer: let us then seek for "grace, that we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear;" remembering that "he is greatly to be feared in the assembly of his saints;" and that he is "a consuming Fire," especially to hypocrites, apostates, and despisers of his great salvation.

NOTES.—CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. The Hebrew converts, after the day of Pentecost, abounded in love to each other, and in all the fruits of this holy affection. (Notes, Acts 2:42—47. 4:32—35.) but many things would naturally occur to interrupt that entire harmony, and to stop the current of that liberality, which they at first showed. It was therefore peculiarly proper for the apostle to exhort them to "let bro therly love continue," and to avoid every thing which interfered with their persevering attention to peace, kindness, and reciprocal affection; as became children of one family, and heirs of the same inheritance. He likewise meant to excite them to "brotherly love" towards the Gentile converts, against whom they were generally in some degree prejudiced. (Notes, Eph. 2:11—22. 3:1—7. 4:1—6.) In particular, he exhorted them "not to forget to entertain strangers;" especially such as were driven or had travelled from home, for the sake of the gospel; and who in general were destitute of other accommodation, and dependent on the hospitality of their brethren, though not personally known by them. (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:2. 1 Pet. 4:9—11. 3 John 5—8.) To encourage this kind of charity he reminded them, that some "had entertained angels unawares," as Abraham and Lot. (Notes, Gen. 18:19:)—It has been shown, that one of the three who came to Abraham was called JEHOVAH, and was doubtless the eternal Word and Son of God: but it was not necessary for the apostle to advert to that circumstance, when he merely suggested a hint on the subject.—It could not indeed be expected that the Hebrews would literally be visited by angels, in the form of strangers; but by hospitality to their brethren, for Christ's sake, they in fact received him, and would be rewarded accordingly: (Notes, Matt. 10:40—42. 25:34—40.) and even, if they were mistaken in the character of those strangers to whom they showed this kindness, their intentions would in no wise fail of a gracious recompense.—Many of their brethren also were "bound" in prison, for the sake of the gospel: and they ought to remember the hardships endured by such sufferers, as if they were imprisoned along with them; that they might be excited to adopt every method of alleviating their sorrows, or procuring their release. In short, whatever adversity any of their brethren were exposed to, in their persons, connexions, or circumstances; they ought to sympathize with them, and endeavour to relieve them: recollecting that "they themselves were still in the body," and liable to similar afflictions; and that they would, in that case, reasonably expect the soothing, lenient care of their brethren.—All captives and afflicted persons might be included in the exhortation; but "the household of faith" was specially intended.

V. 4. Many expositors, particularly those of the church of Rome, explain this as an exhortation; "Let marriage be honourable in all things, &c." and doubtless the apostle meant, that it ought to be entered into, and behaved in, according to the holy commandments of God: that it might be honourable to the persons themselves, and to their profession of the gospel; as well as that the state should be had in honour, and considered as undefiled. The particle but, however, introducing the second clause, shows that his primary meaning was to assert, that "marriage" in itself "was honourable in all" things, and in all persons, and "the bed undefiled" as to its own nature, though not incapable of abuse: for he contrasts marriage with the conduct of fornicators and adulterers, whom God will certainly judge and condemn for their violations of his law. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, 1 Cor. 5.9—13. 6:9—11. Gal. 5:19—21. Eph. 5:3—7. Rev. 21:5—8. 22:14,15.) Some persons, in the primitive times, contended for the lawfulness of fornication; and most abominable sentiments and practices, in respect of polygamy and divorces, prevailed not only among the Gentiles, but even to an astonishing degree among the Jews: while, on the other hand, some of both, and of the Christians, condemned marriage, or at least deemed it a less holy state than celibacy. This "mystery of iniquity" very early began to work: and the apostle, in a few most expressive words, guarded against both the extremes; which experience has always proved to be, in different forms, but almost equally destructive to morality, the welfare of society, and the purity of religion. (Notes, Gen. 2:21—24. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.)

V. 5 6. The Hebrews were generally poor; many had sold their estates to relieve their brethren, after the day of Pentecost: and the goods of others had been plundered by their persecutors. (10:34.)—The apostle had strenuously exerted himself to procure them a liberal relief from the Gentile churches: (Notes, Rom. 15:22—29. 2 Cor. 8: 9:) but he here exhorts them, to let their whole conduct, discourse, and manner of life, be evidently at a distance from 'covetousness;" neither being anxious about getting money to lay up, or to expend in superfluities: nor yet to be tenacious of what they had, or averse to lay it out for valuable purposes. On the contrary, it was proper for them to be "content," well satisfied, and pleased, with "such things as they had" at present, though mean, scanty, or precarious: assured that infinite wisdom and love chose their portion for them; and remembering the promise of God, that "he would not in any wise leave them;" nor in any wise, on any account, in any emergency, or at any time would he forsake them. The emphasis of the original words, in which five negatives are used to increase the strength of the negation, according to the Greek idiom, can scarcely be retained in a translation. The words seem to be quoted from the Lord's address to Joshua, (Josh. 1:5.) though nearly the same are used in several parts of the Scripture. (Marg. Ref. l.)—They, however, evidently show that every believer, in similar circumstances, may rely upon the promises made specially to any person, as recorded in the Scripture. The Hebrews, therefore, cleaving to the Lord and his service, in the depth of poverty, and in the midst of persecutors, might say with confidence, "The LORD is my Helper," according to the frequent language of the Psalmist: and they might be assured, that he would protect, provide for, and comfort them, in all possible emergencies; and never forsake them, in life or death, but bring them safe to his heavenly rest and glory: and in this confidence, they need not fear what men could do, in any way, to impoverish, distress, or injure them. (Notes, Matt. 6:25—34. Luke 12: 22—34.)—I will, &c. (5) The quotation gives the general meaning conveyed in the Septuagint; but in very different words. (Note, Deut. 31:3—8.)

V. 7, 8. To encourage the patience and perseverance of the Hebrews, even unto a violent death, if that should be set before them; the apostle called on them to "remember such as had presided over them," and spoken the word of God to them, but had been removed by martyrdom; as Stephen, and James whom Herod beheaded, and several others; or, indeed, of those who had died in any other way. They ought carefully to recollect the instructions and behaviour of their deceased pastors, to adhere to the doctrines which they had delivered, and to copy their vigorous faith and constant obedience: 'considering, especially, the conclusion of their course, and the manner in which they departed out of the world; and thinking of the composure and holy joy with which they met the stroke of death, with whatever circumstances of torture or ignominy it was attended. (Note, Acts 7:54—60.) For if they would "end their conversation," or their Christian course of obedience, in the same happy and honourable manner; they must follow their example, and adhere to their doctrine and instructions.—These useful and excellent ministers had indeed been removed: but Jesus Christ, the great Head of the church, was "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" equally merciful, powerful, faithful, and all-sufficient. (Notes, 1:10—12. Rev. 1:4—6,8—11.) As "the Son of God," he was possessed of all possible perfection from eternity; he had continued to exercise those perfections for the good of the church, through all preceding ages; nor was he less perfect and powerful, when "manifested in the flesh," to purchase the church with his "own blood." He continued the same, when exalted in human nature to the mediatorial throne; and when he shall come to judge the world, he will exhibit the same divine perfections and glory; and in like manner to all eternity. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. Mark 8:38. Rev. 20:11—15.) The expression seems to be a periphrasis of immutability, a divine attribute incommunicable to a mere creature: his Person is as immutable as his doctrine, his justice and holiness as his mercy and truth; and all kinds of persons will meet a Judge exactly of the same character, as he manifested when he appeared on earth as a Saviour. The Hebrews might, therefore, confide in him, to support and comfort them under their sufferings for his sake; even as he had supported those who had so happily finished their course.—'That the apostle speaks here, not of their living, but dead guides, will appear, partly from his exhortation to remember them, the living guides being the objects, not of their memory, but sense; partly from the phrase, "have spoken," which intimates, that they

V. 9—14. The apostle exhorted the Hebrews to "trust in Christ," and cleave to him, according to the instructions of their deceased teachers; and, not "to be carried about with divers and strange doctrines," as the clouds are driven by the wind. (Note, Eph. 4:14—16.) Many innovations had been introduced by different descriptions of false teachers, which were all foreign to the simplicity of Christianity; but Christians should especially seek to have their hearts "established" in a single dependence on the grace and mercy of God in Christ; and in the experience of the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, which would both comfort them, and render them steadfast against every delusion. Whereas, if they paid any particular attention to distinctions of meats, or rested in the legal sacrifices and peace-offerings, (on part of which the offerer and his friends feasted before God, as at peace with him;) they would not arrive at stability. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, 9:8—14. 1 Tim. 4:1—10.) They could not indeed expect spiritual profit from such observances; seeing that they, who had heretofore been occupied in them, and had looked no further, had derived no saving benefit from them; and now they were abolished. But true believers had, in the atonement of Christ, the substance of all which had been shadowed forth, by thy sacrifices of the law. The flesh of many of these had been divided between the altar and the priests, who alone were allowed to eat the most holy things. But such of the Hebrews, as continued to minister at the tabernacle or temple, and neglected the gospel, had not the privilege of participating with Christians in feasting upon their spiritual sacrifice: of this the Lord's supper was the appointed memorial, and might perhaps be alluded to. (Notes, John 6:47—58. 1 Cor. 5:6—8. 10:14—22.) An intimation of this seems to have been implied, in the prohibition of the priest's eating any part of the most solemn sin-offerings, the blood of which was carried into the most holy place, on the day of atonement, to expiate the guilt of the nation; for these sin-offerings were ordered to be burned altogether, "without the camp." (Notes, Ex. 29:13,14. Lev. 4: 6:30. 16:) Wherefore Jesus also, that he might set apart and consecrate to God his people, to be a spiritual priesthood, by shedding his own blood, as their "Sin-offering," previously to his entrance with it for them into the heavenly sanctuary; suffered death, not within the precincts of the temple, or even in the holy city, but without the gate, upon mount Calvary. Thus he was, as it were, cast out of the camp as accursed: that he might appear to be the true "Sin-offering," of which all others were the types. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Gal. 3:6—14.) It was, therefore, requisite for believers to renounce all dependence on the legal sacrifices, and the service of the sanctuary, to follow Christ. They ought also most willingly, for his sake, to "bear the reproach" cast upon them on that account; and submit to be excommunicated and vilified by the persecuting priests and scribes; going after Christ out of the camp of Israel, and enduring every indignity for his sake, and after his example. (Notes. Is. 51:7,8. 66:5,6. Matt. 10:21—26,32,33. Mark 8:38. John 15:17—21. Acts 5:41,42. 2 Tim. 1:6—8,16—18. 2:8—13.) Nor should they shrink from any hardships in his cause: even if they were driven from their houses, possessions, and cities, to become exiles and wanderers; or if they were immured in prisons: for, being strangers and pilgrims, they had on earth, even in the most quiet times, "no continuing city," or quiet settlement: but were seeking one to come, even heaven itself, from which they could not be long excluded.

V. 15, 16. The Hebrews needed no atoning sacrifices, except that of Christ: and therefore, living on him by faith, they might disregard the legal oblations, and offer, at a distance from the temple, more acceptable sacrifices than burnt-offerings, or peace-offerings; if, through the mediation of the great High-Priest, they presented to God their continual and fervent praises and thanksgivings, adoring his manifested perfections, celebrating his wonderful works, and gratefully acknowledging his abundant loving kindness towards them. This "fruit of their lips" would be more pleasing and honourable to him, than the fruits of the land, or the firstlings of their cattle. (Notes, Ps. 50:22,23. Phil. 1:9—11. Col. 3:16, 17. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) At the same time they ought not to forget, or neglect, to do good to their indigent brethren, and others in distress, by communicating to them according to their ability: for "with such sacrifices," when offered from a principle of humble faith and love, "God would be well pleased;" as they were a proper expression of their gratitude to him, very honourable to the gospel, and beneficial to mankind, and were the fruits of his grace in their hearts. (Notes, 6:9,10. 2 Cor. 9:12—15. Phil. 4:14—20.)

V. 17. The apostle, as "a debtor to all men," had written to the Hebrews, to establish them in the truth; and he had called on them to remember and follow the faith of their deceased pastors. (Note, 7,8.) But he would also remind them, that they ought to obey those pious teachers and guides who now presided over them, and to "submit" to their instructions, admonitions, and reproofs, as ruling them with spiritual authority derived from the Lord Jesus. For they were appointed to "watch for their souls," and to guard and caution them, against all those errors and sins which might endanger them. (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Ez. 3:17—21. 33:2—9. Matt. 24: 45—51. Acts 20:24—28. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) They performed this important and difficult service, as men who "must give account" for every part of their conduct to him who employed them: so that they could not deliver their own souls, without great vigilance, diligence, faithfulness, and impartiality, which would often constrain them to displease men. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:1—5. 1 Thes. 5:12—15. 1 Tim. 5:17,18.) The people ought therefore to obey the word of God as spoken by them, and submit to his authority as exercised by them: that they might be able to give up their "account with joy," having been successful in their labours; and not with grief and anguish of heart, because of the untractable conduct of those to whom they had been sent; which would not be for the profit of those who occasioned grief to their faithful pastors, but infinitely injurious to them. This must principally relate to the account given before the Lord, as it were, from day to day, with joy or grief, by ministers, of the reception given to their message: for no misconduct of the people will occasion sorrow to the faithful servant of Christ, at the final day of retribution; though their salvation will be unto them "a crown of rejoicing." (Notes, 2 Cor. 2:14—17. 1 Thes. 2:17—20.) The exhortation supposes the faithfulness of ministers and ecclesiastical rulers, and that they exercise a scriptural authority in a proper manner: for no obedience and submission can be due to the usurped dominion of "idol shepherds," unfaithful stewards, or blind guides. To other rulers and superiors honour is required for their office' sake; but to ministers for their work's sake alone.

V. 18, 19. It is plain, from these verses, that the persons immediately addressed, or to whom in the first instance the epistle was sent, would know from whom it came. The apostle desired them to pray for him and his fellow-labourers, as well as for their own pastors; for, however he had been calumniated or suspected by his nation, and however many of his Hebrew brethren had been prejudiced against him; (Note, Acts 21:20—26.) yet he trusted that he "had a good conscience," tender and duly informed; and that he was willing and desirous in all things, and among all persons, to act with integrity, and in a becoming manner. He therefore entreated their prayers for his protection, comfort, and success: but especially, that the providence of God would order things in such a manner, as to enable him to come among them the sooner. For he was persuaded many of them would be glad to see him; and he purposed to come, as soon as he had fully regained his liberty, and had opportunity, notwithstanding all that he had suffered in consequence of his last journey to Jerusalem. It is not known whether he accomplished this purpose or not. (Note, Acts 21:27—40.) 'That I may be quickly restored to you from this confinement, and have an opportunity of rendering you those services, which were prevented by this unjust imprisonment, occasioned by the fury of the populace, when I was last at Jerusalem.' Doddridge. The priests, rulers, and council, were more deeply criminal than even 'the populace.'—Good conscience. (18) Notes, Acts 23:1—5. 24:10—21. 2 Cor. 1:12—14. 5:9—12. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.

V. 20, 21. After desiring the prayers of the Hebrews, in his behalf, the apostle gave them a compendium of his most fervent supplications for them. He addressed himself to the Lord; as "the God of peace," (a title never used but in St. Paul's epistles, Marg. Ref. a.) reconciled to believers, and ready to be at peace with all sinners, who came to him in the appointed way; as the Author of spiritual peace in the hearts and consciences of his people; and the 'Lover of peace and concord, in the church and among mankind: who "had brought again from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep," from whom all pastors derived their authority. Jesus, the great Proprietor of the chosen flock, to whom they had been given, had laid down his life to atone for their sins, and he continually sought them, and brought them home to his fold, where he protected and fed them. (Notes, Ps. 23: Is. 53:6. Ez. 34:23—31. Luke 15:1—6. John 10:10—18. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) In order to show that his ransom was accepted, and that he might perform his gracious work, as "the great Shepherd of his sheep;" God the Father had raised him from the dead, "through the blood of the everlasting covenant." For this may either refer to the reconciled love of God to his people, through the blood of Christ; or to his being brought again from the dead, because his sacrifice was sufficient and accepted, that so he might become "the Shepherd of the sheep;" or to the blessings for which the apostle prayed, and which were bestowed "through the blood of the everlasting covenant;" all these things may be contained in the words; and it is not obvious to determine which was principally intended. The blood of Christ purchased the blessings of the new covenant, and ratified it as unalterable: so that it was rendered perpetual on earth to the end of time, and everlasting in respect of the salvation conferred according to it.—The apostle earnestly entreated "the God of peace," through the mediation of the great Shepherd, and on account of "the blood of the covenant," that he would make the Hebrews "perfect in every good work to do his will;" rectifying every disorder of their souls, and completely fitting them for every part of his 'holy service; working in them" by his new-creating grace, "that which was well-pleasing in his sight," being according to his law and image, and for his glory, and therefore acceptable with him through Jesus Christ; (Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) to whom, even to "the God of peace," he ascribed eternal glory. (Marg. Ref.)—He prayed for them under the full persuasion, that sanctifying grace, and holy obedience, would surely be attended with divine consolations, which he did not particularly mention. (Notes, Eph. 2:4—10. 3:14—19. Phil. 1:9—11. Col. 1:9—14. 1 Thes. 3:11—13. 2 Thes. 2:16,17.)—Blood of the everlasting covenant. V. 22—25. The apostle, as not being immediately placed over the Hebrews, or disposed to speak to them in an authoritative style, entreated them to take in good part "the word of exhortation," warning, and encouragement, which he had sent them, from love to their souls: for he had written a letter to them, in few words, compared with the vast importance, and the great variety, of the subjects discussed in it.—Timothy had, it seems, been confined in prison for preaching the gospel, of which the Hebrews had heard; but the writer informed them that he was at length set at liberty, and that he purposed to come with Timothy to see them, if he were not delayed. It appears hence that the apostle either was at liberty, or had a clear prospect of being speedily liberated: and that the spurious postscript falsely says, that Timothy was the bearer of the epistle. When the argumentative part of the epistle had been read, without the prejudices which the writer's name, in the beginning, would have unavoidably excited: these intimations at the close would have no bad effect. After this, he concluded with salutations, especially to the pastors and rulers of their churches; and from all the Christians in Italy, as well as those at Rome.

Them that have the rule. (24) Τους ηγουμενους. 7,17. Luke 22:26. (Notes, 7,8,17.) The pastors of the church are evidently thus distinguished from the people: but it must be allowed, that no disparity among the pastors is intimated. The apostle James was probably living at this time; and was the principal, though not the only person intended. (Notes, Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 5:21,22.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. "Brotherly love" tends, in such various ways, to the benefit of the church, the comfort of believers, and the honour of the gospel; that the enemy of our souls endeavours, by every means, to interrupt its exercise, and to work upon the remains of our corrupt affections, for that purpose, with a vast variety of most subtle artifices, against which we should be perpetually upon our guard. Hence it is, that so little of this love is found in the church, though so much is read concerning it in the Scriptures; and that so many divisions and controversies prevail among those who seem, in a measure, to have been taught of God to love their brethren! (Notes, John 13:31—35. 17:20—23. 1 Thes. 4:9—12. 1 John 2:7—11. 3:11—24. 4:9—12.)—We best consult our own interest, when we are mindful to use hospitality, and to relieve or entertain our poor brethren, even though they be strangers to us: for thus we entertain Christ himself, whom all angels worship and obey.—When we are exempted from imprisonment, or other grievous adversities, we should take care not to "forget" how many are thus oppressed and bowed down; that we may sympathize with them in their sorrows, and help or comfort them according to our ability; never forgetting to pray for them, in which the poorest, and those far distant, may give them most valuable assistance: for it behooves us to be aware that we are liable to the same distresses, as long as we are in the body. Defilement and dishonour spring from contrariety to the law of God, which is perfectly suited to promote our present and future welfare: "marriage" therefore "is honourable in all;" nor can any defilement attach to it, except when the letter or spirit of God's commandments is violated by men's behaviour respecting it. But God does, in this world, severely mark his abhorrence of those forbidden lusts, to which the depravity of the human heart leads such vast multitudes; (Notes, Gen. 2:24. 1 Cor. 6:18—20.) and he will surely condemn every impenitent fornicator and adulterer at the day of judgment; whatever disguise or excuse he may here use to cloak his wickedness.—Christians, whether poor or rich, should, in all their words and actions, show that they "abhor covetousness." Having in heaven inexhaustible treasures, they should be well satisfied with mean accommodations here: and as God has promised "that he will never leave them, and in no case forsake them;" they have no cause to court the favour or fear the frown of men, or to dread the want of things needful; but may courageously say, "The LORD is my Helper, I will not fear what man can do unto me!"—The instructions and example of ministers, who have honourably and comfortably closed their testimony, should be peculiarly remembered by their survivors. At death, they, as it were, give their last attestation to their doctrine and exhortations; and the happy event of their trials calls on others to "follow their faith," and to consider the joyful end of their course; and all ministers ought to have a peculiar respect to this during their whole lives. But Jesus alone is an everliving Friend, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Still he fills the hungry, encourages the trembling, and welcomes penitents of every class; still he rejects proud Pharisees, abhors painted sepulchres, and teaches all whom he saves, to "love righteousness and to hate iniquity:" and having called them by his grace, he will love them unchangeably, and for ever. Indeed all those, and those alone, will "abide the day of his coming" to judge the world, who would have met with favour from him, when he taught as "the Man of sorrows" on earth.

V. 9—16. We should be careful not to be "carried about with divers and strange doctrines," and diligently seek to have our hearts "established by grace:" for notions and forms never profit those who are occupied in them. Living by faith in Christ, and being consecrated to God through his blood, let us willingly separate from this evil world, and "bear the reproach" of proud formalists, and all the enemies of true religion, however distinguished. "We have here no continuing city;" our pilgrimage will soon end; let us then seek an abiding mansion in the city of our God, and consider all temporal prosperity or adversity, as of scarcely any consequence; being of a transient and evanescent nature. (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:29—31. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 1 Pet. 4:7.) Being "a spiritual priesthood," let us solace ourselves in this evil world, by "offering to God, through Jesus Christ," our "continual sacrifice of praise, even the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name." This, joined with the acceptable sacrifice of liberally and actively doing good to men, for the Lord's sake, will be a sweet anticipation of the joys of heaven, and a preparation for its work and worship.

V. 17—25. All ministers of the gospel should peculiarly remember, that they are called "to watch for men's souls, as those who must give account;" which involves the most weighty and awful responsibility, for dreadful will be their condemnation, if they be slothful, selfish, or unfaithful. Christians should "obey and submit to" their faithful pastors, and take in good part their loving admonitions; that they may give up their account "with joy, and not with grief:" for if such pastors lose their labour, their hearers will lose their souls. Christians should also pray fervently and constantly for their ministers, and for all who sustain that sacred character: for these would generally walk more honourably, and labour more successfully, if the people were more earnest in praying for them. Even when they see, or think they see, something amiss in those who upon the whole "have a good conscience, willing in all things to live honestly;" they should pray the more frequently and earnestly for them. Let us then approach "the God of peace, who brought again from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep;" and, "through the blood of the everlasting covenant," let us beseech him for ourselves and each other, "to make us perfect in every good work, to do his will, working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ;" that we may glorify him for ever. Then every word of exhortation, and every dispensation of Providence will do us good; the communion of saints will be maintained, and "grace will be with us all," till it be completed in glory. Amen.

GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

JAMES, the son of Alpheus, the brother of Jude, and the near relation of our Lord, called also "James the less," probably being lower in stature, or younger, than the other James, is generally allowed to have been the writer of this epistle; (Notes, Matt. 13: 54—58. Luke 24:13—24.) and the few who have doubted of this, have assigned very slight reasons for their hesitation. It is recorded in ecclesiastical history, and 'the Acts of the apostles' confirm the fact, that he generally resided at Jerusalem, superintending the concerns of the churches in that city, and in the neighbouring places, to the end of his life; which was terminated by martyrdom, the circumstances of which are differently related.—He seems to have written this epistle, only a short time before his death; and it is supposed by some, that the sharp rebukes and awful warnings, given in it to his countrymen, stirred up that persecuting rage, which terminated his life: but, indeed, it is peculiarly wonderful, that he should have been preserved so many years, in so perilous a situation; and it can be accounted for, only by ascribing it to the Lord's immediate protection. The epistle is styled general, or catholic, because it was not addressed to any particular church, but to the Jewish converts, throughout their dispersions; indeed with most evident reference also to the unconverted part of the nation. This title, however, is not coeval with the epistle; but was prefixed to it some ages after it was written; and to the subsequent epistles, in several instances with manifest impropriety. It is probable, that the apostle, by means of the elders and Christians at Jerusalem, circulated copies of this epistle, by those strangers who came to the sacred festivals, from the several cities and countries where the Jews resided, and especially where Jewish converts to Christianity were found: and, as it was exclusively addressed to his countrymen, it seems for a long season to have been little known among the Gentile converts; so that its authenticity was doubted for a considerable time.—'While the second Epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, which was made in the beginning of the second century, for the use of converted Jews, this Epistle of James hath found a place therein.—This is an argument of great weight: for certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity, than the converted Gentiles to whom it was not sent; and who perhaps had no opportunity of being acquainted with it, till long after it was written.' Macknight.—'It is cited by Clemens Romanus four several times; and by Ignatius, in his genuine epistle to the Ephesians: by Origen, in his thirteenth homily upon Genesis. Eusebius saith, It was known to most, and publicly read in most Christian churches: St. Jerom, that in process of time it obtained authority. Esthius notes, That they who before doubted of it, in the fourth century embraced the opinion of them who received it: and from thence no church, no ecclesiastical writer, is found who ever doubted of it. But, on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of the holy Scripture, published by general and provincial councils, Roman bishops, or other orthodox writers, number it among the canonical Scriptures.' Whitby.—'It appears to me, that the authority of this, and some other parts of the New Testament, having been early questioned by some primitive churches, affords an argument of their peculiar caution, that no other writings should be admitted into the sacred canon, however excellent: besides those which had an undoubted claim to that distinction: and justly challenges our deference to their judgment, who doubtless were most capable of deciding, and gave sufficient evidence of their care, as well as their capacity. The epistle before us, having passed through a severe and accurate scrutiny, appears to have been universally received; and accordingly has been transmitted down to the present age, as an authentic part of the oracles of God.' Doddridge.—It is generally known, that Luther, in the earlier part of the reformation, spoke rather in a slighting manner of this epistle, groundlessly supposing that it contradicted St. Paul's doctrine, in the grand subject of justification: but deeper experience, more exact investigation, more extensive observation, and a maturer judgment, induced him to retract his opinion: and at present no further doubt seems to be entertained, among orthodox Christians, as to its divine inspiration and authority. It is not, however, so replete with the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, as St. Paul's epistles are in general; or, indeed, as the other apostolical epistles: for it is supposed to have been written with a special design of counteracting the false teachers, who, in different ways, perverted those doctrines, and wrested them to their own destruction, and that of other men. But the grand principles of Christianity are throughout taken for granted, and it will be found, on attentive consideration, entirely coincident with even St. Paul's doctrine, concerning grace and justification: though at the first glance it may appear discordant: and it abounds with most important exhortations to the patience of hope, and the obedience of faith and love: with which various very needful warnings, reproofs, and encouragements, are interspersed, according to the different characters of the persons addressed in it.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle addresses "the twelve tribes which were scattered abroad," 1. He exhorts them to joyful patience under trials, 2—4; and to ask wisdom of God in faith, with an unwavering mind, 5—8. He counsels the poor and the rich, 9—11; and shows the happiness prepared for those who endure, 12. Men are tempted to sin, not by God, but by their own lusts, 13—15. Every good gift comes from the unchangeable God, of which good gifts regeneration is especially mentioned, 16—18. Cautions against pride, loquacity, anger, and malice, 19, 20: admonitions to receive the word of God in meekness, and to reduce it to practice, 21—25. The necessity of bridling the tongue, 26. The nature of true religion, 27.

[a]JAMES, [b]a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, [c]to the twelve tribes which are [d]scattered abroad, [e]greeting.

2 My brethren, [f]count it all joy when ye fall into [g]divers temptations;

3 Knowing this, [h]that the trying of your faith worketh [i]patience.

4 But [k]let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be [l]perfect and entire, [m]wanting nothing.

5 If [n]any of you lack wisdom, [o]let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, [p]and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him.

6 But [q]let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For [r]he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed.

7 For [s]let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord.

8 A [t]double-minded man is unstable in all his ways. [Practical Observations.]

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1. It is probable, that the apostolical authority of James was not disputed, among those whom he more immediately addressed; so that he waved the mention of it, and only styled himself "the servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." (Marg. Ref. b.)—It appears from the Acts of the Apostles, as well as from historical records, that he resided chiefly at Jerusalem; and he is said to have been the first bishop of that church. This indeed is spoken inaccurately; for he certainly possessed far more than episcopal authority, however that may be defined; and surely it could be no preferment to an apostle, to be appointed a diocesan bishop! He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom, not very long after writing this epistle, though the date of that event is uncertain.—He addressed himself "to the twelve tribes," which were considered as still existing, though "scattered" by various calamities, and from different motives, into many distant nations of the earth; but he principally intended the Christians among them; and he simply greeted them, or wished them health and peace, without using the benedictions which introduce most of the other epistles.—Scattered.] 'That is, to all the believing Jews, of whatever tribe, who were dispersed over the earth; to whom it is probable James, remaining still at Jerusalem, sent this epistle, by those who were used to meet at that city from all nations, at the festivals.' Beza.—Some of all the other tribes still subsisted, as distinct from the Gentiles, and as generally incorporated with the descendants of Judah: and the nation was dispersed abroad in almost all parts of the known world; as it is evident from the Scriptures themselves, as well as from the testimony of ancient writers. (Marg. Ref. d.)—Greeting.] James, who probably drew up the epistle of the council at Jerusalem, to the Gentile converts, there uses the same word. (Notes, Acts 15:22—29.)

Which are scattered abroad.] Εν τη διασπορα. John 7:35. 1 Pet. 1:1. In the dispersion. Comp. of δια, and σπειρω, to sow; scattered abroad as seed. (Notes, Hos. 2:21—23. Am. 9:7—10. 1 Pet. 1:1,2.)

V. 2—4. Knowing the afflicted and persecuted condition in which his brethren were: the apostle exhorted them to "count it" altogether a cause of rejoicing, when they "fell into divers temptations." Conscious of their weakness, they were in general warned not to run into temptation, and taught to pray not to be "led into temptation." (Notes, Matt. 6:13. 26:40,41.) Yet if the Lord saw good, that, notwithstanding their watchfulness, they should fall into such "trials," as might expose them to temptation, and give them an opportunity of resisting and overcoming it; they ought to consider it as a matter of unmingled joy, an occasion of evidencing the sincerity and strength of their love to God, and as a rich advantage to their souls, though painful for the time. (Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. Luke 6:21—23. 1 Pet. 1:6,7. 4:12—16.) For they might know, from the word of God and their own experience, that the "trial of their faith," by which its genuine nature and strength were proved, had a tendency, in the event, to "work patience" in their temper and conduct; and to bring them into a resigned, dependent, waiting frame of mind, connected with meekness and perseverance in well doing. But, in order to derive the full benefit from their trials, they must allow "patience to have its perfect work;" and submissively wait, in reliance on the promises of God, and obedience to his commandments, till he saw good to deliver them; without being induced, by the number, variety, or duration of their sufferings, to use sinful means of deliverance, or grow "faint" and "weary in well doing;" or to manifest peevishness, discontent, or despondency. (Notes, 12:5,7—11. Heb. 6:13—15. 10:35—39. 11:27.) Thus "patience," like a salutary medicine, would "have its perfect operation," and bring them into so tractable, docile, meek, compassionate, and resigned a state of mind; so endear to them the love and sufferings of Christ; so wean them from the world, and so reconcile them to death; that they would be rendered complete and mature in every part of the Christian character, and in all respects meet and prepared for the duties of their several situations, and "wanting nothing" in order to the performance of every good work. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. Heb. 12:4—13.)

Temptations. (2) Πειρασμοις. Matt. 6:13. 26:41. Luke 22:28. 1 Cor. 10:13. Gal. 4:14. Heb. 3:8. 1 Pet. 1:6. Some persons lay considerable stress on the distinction between temptations and trials: but the original word is the same as that in the Lord's prayer, which is rendered "temptation." Indeed every trial is, or gives occasion to, temptation; and every temptation is a trial of our hearts, and tends to show whether divine grace or corrupt nature has at that time the ascendency. (Notes, 12—15. Gen. 22:1.) The apostle, however, no doubt especially referred to the persecutions, for the sake of their Lord, to which Christians were then peculiarly exposed.—The trying. (3) Το δοκιμιον. 1 Pet. 1:7. Comp. of ὁλος, the whole, and κληρος, lot. 'Entitled, without dispute, to the entire inheritance.'

V. 5—8. In attempting properly to endure and improve their trials, as well as in a great variety of other matters, many, to whom the apostle wrote, would experience and discover, that they were very deficient in wisdom. When, therefore, any were conscious, that they were not capable of distinguishing truth from error, or of ascertaining the line of conduct which they ought to pursue; they should immediately bring the case before God, and earnestly beseech him to be their Teacher and Counsellor, by the influences of his Spirit enabling them to understand, remember, and apply the instructions of his holy word; and to remove all prejudices and carnal passions, which tended to mislead them. This any person might do with confidence; seeing the Lord was ever ready to "give liberally" to all who asked him, of whatever description they were; nor did he ever upbraid such humble petitioners for wisdom with the folly and sinfulness of their former conduct, or with any of their mistakes, and want of teachableness. So that assuredly wisdom would be given to every one who thus sought for it, in proportion to his wants, difficulties, and duties. (Notes, 1 Kings 3:5—14. Prov. 2:1—7. 3:5,6.) But, in order to obtain the blessing, they must "ask in faith, nothing wavering:" they must not allow themselves to question whether this were the proper way of seeking wisdom, or doubt of the faithfulness of God to his promises; but confidently rely on him to direct them in the right way. For "he that wavered," or hesitated in his judgment in these respects, and was disposed to listen to carnal counsellors, or to halt between God and the world, would be always fluctuating and variable; being tossed from one thing to another, by every change of circumstances, or every gale of doctrine, as the wave of the sea is driven about by the wind. (Notes, Matt. 21:21,22. Mark 11:22—26. Rom. 4:18—22. Eph. 4:14—16. Jude 11—13.) Such wavering professors of the gospel, therefore, who were religious only by starts, and had no abiding, realizing belief of the truth, or dependence on the promises of God, could have no good reason to expect, that they should receive any thing from him: as they would scarcely have presented their prayers, under some sudden pang of devotion, but they would turn to other counsels and projects. Indeed, "double-minded men are unstable in all their ways," nor can any dependence be placed on them; whilst they are aiming to unite contrary interests, and are unsettled in their principles for want of faith in the word of God. (Notes, Gen. 49:3,4. Josh. 24:15. 1 Kings 18:21. Matt. 6:22—24.)—'Let him come to God with firm adherence on him; a mind resolved, whatsoever comes, to stick fast to God; to use no means of delivering himself, but such as are acceptable to him; never entertaining a doubt, whether God's ways or his own are to be adhered to for the obtaining of his ends; making no question

He will perpetually be running into inconsistencies of conduct; and those imperfect and undetermined impressions of religion, which he feels will serve rather to perplex and torment, than guide and secure him.' Doddridge.—The divided dependence, at sometimes apparently on God, and at others evidently on a man's own wisdom, resolution, or righteousness, seems also implied; as well as the divided aim and purpose. Such characters differ widely from weak believers; who constantly expect and seek help from God, and do not allow any doubts of his veracity and faithfulness; though they are harassed with fears, lest there be something in their case, or manner of asking, which should exclude them from the benefit. Their language is, "Lord, to whom shall I go? Thou hast the words of eternal life?"

This, however, is not the signification of the original, in this place at least. It denotes 'a man of unsettled, and fluctuating sentiments, too solicitous about the present to attain the future, too anxious about the future to secure the present; who, driven hither and thither in his judgment of things, is perpetually shifting the object; who this moment would sacrifice all for eternity, and the next renounce any thing for this present life.' Œcumenius in Campbell.—Unstable.] Ακαταστατος. Here only. 'One who cannot stand firm; but is thrown down by the least touch.'

V. 9—11. In order to attain greater simplicity and stability in the faith, it was proper for believers to know in what they ought to "rejoice," or glory. "The brother of low degree," the real Christian, who was poor and afflicted in his outward circumstances, should not deem himself unhappy on that account: on the contrary he ought to rejoice or glory, 'to comfort himself and lift up his heart;' Beza; because he was exalted, in an honourable relation to Christ, in being conformed to him as to his outward condition, and in being made as one of "the sons of God, and heirs" of heaven. (Notes, 2:5—7. Luke 6:20. Rom. 12:14—16. 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 8:1—9. 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) But the affluent Christian ought not to rejoice or glory in his riches, or at all trust in them for happiness: (Notes, Jer. 9:23,24. 1 Tim. 6:17—19.) rather let him rejoice, in that "he is made low" in the disposition of his heart; having been convinced of his guilt, depravity, and misery, and made humbly willing as an indigent pensioner on the mercy of God, to ask for the blessings of salvation, in the same way with the poorest of his brethren; and to consider himself as no wiser or better than they, but merely intrusted with a larger stewardship, of which a proportionable account must shortly be rendered. (Notes, Luke 16:1—13.) Being thus "made low" would be a solid ground for exaltation; seeing that few rich persons were thus humbled and made "poor in spirit:" nor would the cause for this joy be abated, even if they were made low in circumstances also, through the rapacity of their persecutors. For all outward splendour and distinction must soon pass away, as the gaudy flowers, which grow among the grass, are withered by the scorching sun, and lose all their beauty and transient glory, even sooner than the green blade does; and being withered they perish, and are less valuable than the common herbage. (Marg. Ref. z—b.) Thus rich men flourish only to be cut down: they grow but to wither, and their transient distinctions terminate in deeper misery and disgrace, if they proceed "in their ways" of avarice, luxury, pride, selfishness, or ungodliness; and are not made low, by repentance, faith, self-denial, crucifixion to the world, and submission to the righteousness and authority of God. (Notes, Matt. 19:23—26. Luke 1:46—55. 6:24—26. 12:15—21. 16:19—26. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.) This is an obvious and apposite interpretation. But to render the passage, (by inserting a word needlessly,) "Let the rich be ashamed, in that he is brought low;" as some learned men do, wholly destroys the energy and beauty of the contrast: and to explain it exclusively of the rich man, when reduced to poverty for the sake of the gospel; would imply, that no rich man, however humble, poor in spirit, liberal, and condescending to his poor brethren, could have any ground of rejoicing, or glorying in Christ, and in the hope of glory; unless he voluntarily relinquished, or were forcibly deprived of, his estate and possessions, and so reduced to entire poverty! A doctrine well suited to some orders of papists, but not at all to genuine Christianity. It is proper that some persons should be the Lord's stewards and almoners, in outward things: and if they be made low, as humble, teachable, penitent believers in Christ, and thankful to be thus employed by him; let them rejoice in this humiliation of heart, under these circumstances, which almost always increase pride and self-exaltation. (Note, Matt. 5:3.)

V. 12. While the world deemed those happy who enjoyed uninterrupted prosperity, though it served to increase their pride, avarice, sensuality, and impiety; those were indeed to be congratulated, as "blessed, who endured temptation," and passed through various afflictive and trying dispensations, with submissive constancy, and the persevering obedience of faith and hope. For after the Christian had been thus proved, and the reality of his grace manifested; and after his holy affections had been thus invigorated, and the temper of his mind improved; he would be honoured, as a conqueror in the spiritual contest: not with a wreath of fading flowers, but with "the crown of life;" the "honour, glory, and immortality," which the Lord had promised to them that love him, as reconciled to him and made to delight in him and his ways, by faith in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, 2:5—7. 5:9—11. Rom. 8:28—31. Heb. 12:2—11. 1 Pet. 5:1—4. Rev. 2:10,11.)

V. 13—15. When trials become "temptations," and occasions of sin, no man should venture to say, that he is "tempted by God;" as if he were the Author of transgression, or of the dishonourable event of the trial. (Notes, 2—4. Gen. 22:1.)—The commandments and providential dispensations of God make trial of men's hearts, and tend to discover what dispositions prevail in them. Where gracious affections are prevalent, through the power of the Holy Spirit, remarkable obedience and fidelity are the consequence of the trial; but when sin and Satan rule within, disobedience must be the effect. (Notes, Deut. 8:2,3,16. 13:1—5. 2 Sam. 24:1,2. 1 Chr. 21:1. 2 Chr. 32:30—33. Prov. 17:3.) Nothing, therefore, which is sinful, in the heart or conduct, can be ascribed to God, without the same absurdity as it would be to charge darkness and coldness on the sun. (Note, Ex. 4:21.) "For God cannot be tempted with evil;" his absolute perfection and all-sufficiency render it impossible that there should ever be any inducement for him, in the most minute degree, to deviate from complete and entire justice, truth, wisdom, purity, and goodness: neither "doth he," in this sense, "tempt any man" by putting evil into his heart, suggesting it to his thoughts, or necessitating the commission of it. He is not the Author of the dross, though his fiery trial detects and exposes it. But "every man is tempted" to commit sin, when the inordinate desires of his heart after worldly ease, exemption from persecution, honour, wealth, or pleasure, induce him to seize the bait, with which Satan entices him: thus he is drawn out of the line of duty; as the fish is dragged out of the water when it has been enticed by the delusive morsel, which covered the hook. (Notes, Ec. 9:11,12. 2 Tim. 2:23—26.) So that when "lust," or vehement desire after any object which cannot be obtained without sin, "is conceived" in the heart, through the suggestions of Satan, and the allurements of external objects; the purpose of indulgence is admitted and cherished. Thus actual transgression is brought forth; and when this is completed, "it bringeth forth death," as its genuine offspring: and nothing but the mercy and grace of God, through Christ Jesus, can prevent the sinner's final destruction. This may be considered as the scriptural account of the original of moral evil, the natural history of the conception, production, progeny, and consequence of the first sin, and of every sin; except as repentance, through God's mercy in Christ Jesus, prevents the effects of them. (Notes, Gen. 3:1—6. Josh. 7:20—26. 2 Sam. 11:1—5.)—But perhaps the apostle referred to the case of apostates, who, under persecutions, through love of the world, conceived the purpose of renouncing Christianity; which, being deliberately done and persisted in, ended in their final obduracy and destruction.—It is egregious and pernicious trifling, and manifestly absurd, to take occasion from the English word "lust," which is often used to mean one particular sensual inclination, when impetuous and ungoverned, to limit the passage merely to sensuality; as if the impetuous and ungoverned desire of power, praise, wealth, or revenge, were not "lusting," as much as the sensual inclinations. The original word indeed is often used in a good sense; (Luke 22:15. Phil. 1:23.) and simply means a vehement inclination, whatever be the object. (Note, Rom. 7:7,8.)

V. 16—18. It behooved all concerned, to be very careful not to mistake in this most important matter; lest they should be induced to listen to temptation, and deviate from their duty, from an erroneous supposition that circumstances would excuse their sins; or lest they should dishonour and offend God, by ascribing that misconduct to him, which was solely the effect of their own apostate nature, and external circumstances. Every thing good, of whatever kind, must be considered as a gift and bounty coming down from God: being beneficial in itself and perfect in its kind; like its great Author, who is "the Father," the Source, and the Fountain "of light," natural, moral, and spiritual; the Author of whatever is beautiful, excellent, and good, in all creatures and in the whole universe; as well as of all true knowledge, wisdom, holiness, and felicity, in those rational agents who never sinned, and in redeemed sinners. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, John 1:4—9.) But nothing of a contrary nature comes down from him, "with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." The sun, the great natural light, which he has made, appears to us to have several changes and turnings, whence summer and winter, day and night, succeed each other; but in fact these appearances arise entirely from our varied situation respecting it. Thus God is immutably the Fountain of good, and of nothing else; all good is to be ascribed to him and sought from him: but the evil, which we do or suffer, with all the changes which we experience, are from ourselves: the consequences of our having turned away from God, and of a change in our situation respecting him; and must not in any degree be ascribed to Him, who is unchangeably the same in his nature and perfection, without the least variation. Indeed his conduct proceeds upon the same unalterable principles of justice, truth, wisdom, and goodness; whatever effect it may produce on us, according to our character, behaviour, or state in his sight: and all sin, error, ignorance, and misery must be ascribed to the mutability, frailty, and imperfection of created beings.—It should also be remembered, that all to whom the apostle wrote, as well as others, had been in themselves "dead in sin" and "children of wrath;" and that God, "of his own will," had regenerated them by his Spirit, "through the word of truth." (Notes, John 3:1—8. Eph. 2:1—10. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 1:23—25. 1 John 3:7—10.) This he had most graciously done, in order that they might be consecrated to his service, as "a kind of first-fruits of his creatures," more excellent and valuable than the rest of them; and as an earnest of a vastly larger increase from the Gentile world, in that and future ages; even as the first-fruits, presented to the Lord, were the earnest of the future harvest, and brought a blessing upon it. V. 19—21. As believers owed all the difference, in their state and character, to the sovereign will and distinguishing grace of God, by means of "the word of truth;" (Note, 17—19.) it behooved all of them to be "swift" and prompt "to hear" further admonitions, instructions, and counsels, from the same source, in a teachable and attentive manner. They ought likewise to "be slow to speak;" not being rash, or dogmatical, in their judgment and decisions, not hasty to assume the office of teachers, (Note, 3:1,2.) not allowing themselves to dispute of things beyond their depth; and not indulging a conceited loquacious humour; as speaking for the sake of speaking, or in the hope of obtaining applause, without due seriousness, modesty, recollection, and prudence. They should also be "slow to wrath;" not giving way to angry tempers, bitterness of spirit against opposers, or proneness to acrimonious controversy, under a mistaken notion of great zeal for the truth. On the contrary, they should be slow and backward to entertain or express any kind or degree of resentment, even against their most cruel persecutors; assured that "the wrath of man" was not a proper means of promoting the interests of religion in the world, or leading men to embrace the gospel and lead holy lives. (Notes, 3:13—18. 4:1—6.) For such proud contentions, and violent tempers, tended still more to prejudice the minds of unbelievers against the gospel; to disturb the peace and corrupt the purity of the church; to multiply iniquities, and in every way to hinder the knowledge and practice of "the righteousness of God." The apostle therefore exhorted all who might read his epistle, to "lay apart," and to cast off with abhorrence, as a filthy garment, the sinful practices of their past lives, which were abominable in the sight of God; and especially to avoid and repress the "overflowings," or abundance, of malignity, which many indulged under the notion of zeal; whereas they proceeded entirely from the predominancy of pride, wrath, envy, and other hateful passions. Thus they ought to be prepared, to "receive the word of God" in a meek, docile, humble, and peaceable frame of mind. (Note, 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) For it could profit them, only when it became an "engrafted word," or implanted word, living and growing in the soul by faith and love, as the principle of a new nature; changing their views, judgment, dispositions, and affections, into conformity to his own holiness, and so producing suitable fruit in their lives.—And being thus received and engrafted, it would powerfully effect the complete salvation of their souls, as the means by which the Spirit of God began, carried on, and would perfect his new creation of the soul to holiness. V. 22—25. In order that "the word of truth" might produce these blessed effects on the souls of those who heard it; they must "be doers of it, and not hearers only." For if they were "only hearers," however attentive, constant, or teachable they might seem to be; their neglect of practising what they had heard would prove, that the word was not engrafted in their hearts, and that they were putting a most fatal imposition on themselves, by some specious but delusive and sophistical reasoning: whether custom, curiosity, a love of speculation, or a vain confidence in knowledge without obedience, for salvation, induced them to attend. A man of this description, who heard the gospel, and did not obey its call to repentance, faith in Christ, and a sober, righteous, and godly life, was like a person, who gave a transient look at "his natural face," as reflected from a mirror, without attempting to alter what was unbecoming in his attire or appearance; who would therefore immediately depart, and soon "forget what manner of man he was:" and the glimpse which he had of himself would have no abiding effect on him. (Notes, Matt. 7:24—27. 13:18,19. Luke 6:46—49. 11:27,28.) Thus, the mere hearer might have shortlived convictions of his sinfulness; but displeased with the view given of his state, heart, and character, in the mirror of the sacred word, and having no effectual desires of an entire change; he would soon lose sight of his transient discoveries, in the company, business, and pleasures of the world, and so remain ignorant of himself, and destitute of transforming grace. But "whosoever looked," steadfastly and attentively, into the word of God, with a real desire of learning from it his true state and character, and the way of acceptance and salvation; and "continued" with perseverance in this important inquiry: he, "not being a forgetful hearer," but one who reduced to practice what he learned from time to time, though it cost him much humiliation and self-denial, would be "blessed in his deed," or in his doing: the Lord would in this way lead him into the knowledge of his truth and salvation; his obedience would evidence the sincerity of his faith; his sanctification would proportionably advance, as he became acquainted with God and with himself; and his gracious recompense hereafter would succeed his present peace and comfort.—Some by "the perfect law of liberty," suppose the moral law to be intended, in opposition to the ceremonial: and it certainly deserves that title in itself, as perfect obedience to it is perfect liberty, and every deviation from it is slavery: but then it cannot give liberty to us sinners. Others, therefore, suppose the gospel to be intended; because by it we are set at liberty from condemnation, and the bondage of sin. But divine revelation in general seems to be meant; as every part of it has its use, in bringing the sinner to Christ for salvation, and in directing and encouraging him to walk at liberty, by the Spirit of adoption, according to the holy commandments of God. In the word of truth, as the law, or rule, of obtaining and enjoying liberty, the true Christian looks as into a mirror; that he may discover the remaining unholiness of his temper, affections, words, and actions; in order that his soul may be purified from defilement, beautified with salvation, and transformed into the holy image of God, continually more and more. V. 26. So necessary was practice, in every particular, to the very existence of real Christianity; that if "any man," among professed believers, appeared to be a devout worshipper of God, according to the doctrine and ordinances of the gospel; and if his conduct in other respects were not reprehensible, yet, in case he habitually neglected to bridle his tongue, and so gave a loose to vain, polluting, ostentatious, or improper discourse; especially if he uttered bitter, malicious, slanderous, or reviling words, in an unrestrained manner, under pretence of zeal against such as differed from him; and "deceived his own heart" by one vain excuse or another, to think this was allowable, or consistent with the Christian temper: his religion was thus proved to be vain and worthless, his heart was not right in the sight of God, whilst "out of the abundance" of it such evil things habitually proceeded; but he was "in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity." Notes 3:3—12. Ps. 39:1—4. Matt. 12:33—37. Rom. 3:9—18. Eph. 4:29. 5:3,4. Col. 3:7—11.) This is the general interpretation; and nothing more is supposed to have been intended. Yet men do not bridle horses, merely to restrain them from mischief, or from going in a wrong way: but likewise in order to rule and direct them in the right way; that they may be useful, and not merely inoffensive. Surely then, the refraining from evil discourse, and not perverting the gift of speech, by which man is distinguished from all other creatures here below, is far from the whole, which is intended by "bridling the tongue!" Beyond doubt, the proper improvement of that important talent is also meant: the tongue must be held in, and kept from improper discourse, and directed to that conversation, which tends "to the use of edifying," and is suited to "minister grace unto the hearers." It will perhaps be found, that those who have any regard to God and their duty, offend as frequently by silence, when they ought to speak, as by speaking, when they should be silent: but sins of omission are generally less regarded than sins of commission. How often do cowardice, indolence, and lukewarmness, make us silent; when holy courage, active zeal, and fervent love, would excite us to attempt "a word in season," which God often most eminently blesses. (Notes, Deut. 6:6—9. Ps. 37:29—31. Prov. 10:20,21. 15:2,7,23. 24:26. 25: 11—13.)

V. 27. "Pure religion," the holy worship and service of God, free from corrupt mixtures, and undefiled by corrupt motives and carnal passions, as exercised in the sight of "God, even the Father," with his approbation, by his adopted children in Christ Jesus, essentially consists in disinterested, humble, self-denying love to men for the Lord's sake and from love to him; and in taking pleasure from these motives, in visiting "orphans, widows," and other afflicted or destitute persons; to sooth their sorrows, relieve their wants, and afford them protection, counsel, and comfort, in their distresses: and in keeping at a distance from the sinful pursuits, interests, pleasures, maxims, fashions, and pollutions of this wicked world: so that a man may have no stain upon his garments, no blemish on his character, no guilt upon his conscience, on that account.—Without some measure of this holy love, and this mortification to the world, no doctrines, forms, confidence, high affections, zeal, or apparent devotion, can prove a man an accepted worshipper of God. Our true religion is exactly equal to the measure in which these things have place in our hearts, experience, and conduct; and these are therefore the criteria of "pure and undefiled religion," by which we should judge of it, in ourselves and in others, both as to the reality of it, and the degree in which it is possessed. But this holy love, and mortification to the world, can be produced only by faith in a crucified Saviour, and the supply of his sanctifying Spirit; so that no appearance even of these things can be depended on, except they spring from, and are connected with, a credible and intelligent profession of faith, a reliance on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus for salvation, and the regular and fervent worship of God, in public and in private. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. "The servants of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ," must consider themselves, as employed to do good to the chosen tribes of the true Israel, through all their dispersions in this evil world, in every way which they are able. —"Divers temptations" we must meet with: and if we "fall into them" without our own fault, and have only the distress of bearing them, without the guilt of yielding to them; we may deem it a great cause of joy to be thus proved and purified in the furnace, and made meet for future honour and felicity. (Note, Heb. 2:16—18.) For these painful but short trials tend to reduce the gracious heart into a more submissive temper, and a more cordial acquiescence in the will of God: and when patience, in its various exercises, has "its perfect work," it meliorates all the dispositions and affections of the soul; produces a peculiar simplicity, humility, and tenderness; corrects the harshness and roughness natural to many of us; and matures "the fruits of righteousness" to the greatest advantage. In this severe school the Christian makes his greatest proficiency; and becomes perfect and Cautions against partial regard to the rich, and contempt of the poor, especially in places of worship, as contrary to the law of love, 1—9. The transgression of one commandment violates the whole law, 10—12. No mercy will be shewn to the unmerciful, 13. As love, shown by words alone, is worthless; so faith without works is dead and unprofitable, 14—20. This is illustrated by the examples of Abraham and Rahab, 21—26.

entire," in every part of his temper and conduct, according to the measure of attainment which may be arrived at in this world; and is defective in nothing requisite for the due performance of the services required of him. But in respect of this, and every other part of our conduct, we shall feel that we "are deficient in wisdom," in proportion as we become acquainted with ourselves: nor shall we, if we reverence the Scriptures, seek it in the schools of philosophy, or from the counsels of the wise men of this world; but we shall ask the precious boon of God, and obtain the substance, while others are deceived with an empty shadow. As "God giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not;" (Note, Matt. 11:20—24.) and has engaged that wisdom shall be given to them who ask it of him; every man, who feels his want of heavenly wisdom, may apply to him for this inestimable benefit, without fear of meeting a refusal. (Notes, 4:1—3. Matt. 7:7—11. Luke 11: 5—13.) Did we fully avail ourselves of this privilege, how greatly should we be enriched with divine knowledge; and how prudently should we conduct all our concerns, and avoid every snare and device of our enemies! But pride, prejudice, and a carnal mind, co-operating with unbelief, not only preclude multitudes entirely from these treasures; but, in some degree, prevent all of us from drawing from them so copiously as we otherwise might do.—If men be divided in their judgment, between a dependence on the promises of God, in the use of appointed means, and other methods of seeking wisdom; if, instead of "trusting in the Lord with all their hearts," they "lean to their own understandings," and "are wise in their own conceits;" if they do not really believe that the Lord will be as good as his word; or if they question whether heavenly things are decidedly preferable to earthly; no wonder, that they are like "the waves of the sea, which are driven with the wind and tossed:" and while they receive nothing from God, they have none to blame but themselves. When we see so many of these "double-minded" men on every side, who "are unstable in all their ways;" we are reminded to pray for the increase of faith, that we may waver no more, but trust in the Lord, and cleave to him alone. (Notes, Ps. 51:10. Acts 11:23, 24. 1 Cor. 15:55—58.)

V. 9—18. If there were any substantial satisfaction in earthly things, there might be some speciousness in attempting to "serve God and Mammon:" but as all below is "vanity and vexation of spirit;" the poor believer may well rejoice in being exalted to an interest in Christ, and in the prospect of glory in heaven, though he have all kind of hardships by the way: and the rich have at least equal cause for rejoicing, if God has humbled them before his mercy-seat, though the world despise and hate them on that account; nay, though they should be stripped of their possessions and reduced to poverty for the cause of Christ. For "the fashion of this world passeth away," and all its magnificence and show of happiness fadeth and withereth, "like the flower of the grass;" and most miserable are those rich men, who "fade away," in the pride of ungodly prosperity. But "blessed are they," who patiently endure trials, and manfully resist temptation; for "through much tribulation shall they enter into the kingdom of God;" and "having been tried" and approved, "they shall receive the" unfading "crown of glory, which God hath promised to them that love him." But let not hypocrites, who being tempted to renounce the profession of the gospel, yield to the temptation, and cannot endure the trial; or believers, who through unwatchfulness are overcome in some sharp conflict, venture for a moment to say, or think, that they are "tempted by God;" "for he cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man:" and if a man dare thus foolishly to charge God with being the Author of sin, in any way, or on any pretence; he may certainly expect some dreadful rebuke of his presumption. For when the depravity of the heart has influenced men to hearken to Satan's enticements and catch at his baits; and so sin has been conceived and finished, and condemnation justly incurred: it is no less than blasphemy to throw the blame upon the righteous providence, or decrees, or holy commandments of God. Such inferences from important truths, ill understood, should be carefully avoided; whilst we remember that "every good and perfect gift cometh down from the unchangeable Father of light," the inexhaustible Fountain of wisdom, holiness, and felicity.—But if we be "Christians indeed," the Lord has, "according to his determinate purpose," and "the counsel of his own will," begotten us again with the word of truth: we should therefore give him all the glory of this happy change, and consecrate all our faculties to his service, that we may be "a kind of first-fruits of his creatures," and blessings to all around us.

V. 19—27. It behooves us all to be "swift to hear, slow to speak, and slow to wrath;" even when religious zeal, as we may suppose, prompts us to a different conduct: for "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God;" but is the scandal and bane of every society in which it is indulged. Let us then "lay apart all filthiness, and the overflowings of maliciousness," and every kind of wickedness; that we may receive with humble teachableness, and maintain with "meekness" and love, the sacred truths contained in the holy Scriptures; which, being engrafted in the heart, are effectual to the salvation of our souls. But, while we are "swift to hear" the word of God, let us take care to be "doers of it, and not hearers only; lest we deceive our own souls;" for many such are found in the best instructed congregations who deceive scarcely any but themselves.—The word of God is a faithful mirror, to show us the deformity and pollution of our souls; and a monitor, to teach us how we may remove them, and adorn ourselves with the beauties of holiness. Happy would it be for mankind, were they in general as assiduous in seeking this inward, durable, and spiritual adorning, as they are in decorating their poor, mortal bodies, that they may appear comely in the eyes of their fellow-worms! Transient glimpses, however, and notional discoveries, leave mere hearers unchanged; and a large majority choose, and even endeavour to go away from the most faithful sermon, and "forget what manner of persons they are." But "whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty," and meditates continually on the holy word of God, not as "a forgetful hearer," but as an obedient believer, shall be "blessed in his deed;" for in this way he shall find out whatever in his heart and conduct needs repentance, forgiveness, and the "sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience:" thus Christ will become more precious to his soul; and by his grace he will daily grow more and more "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light," and have more abundant anticipations of their holy felicity.—But our "words" must be attended to, as well as our actions: for, "whatever appearances" there may be of true religion, in the creed, worship, and outward conduct of any man; yet, if he "bridle not his tongue," he "deceiveth his own heart, and all his religion is vain." No wonder that disputations, contentions, and noisy talkers about forms and doctrines, disrelish this epistle; when the unbridled licence indulged to their tongues exposes them to an unqualified charge of total hypocrisy, in the very opening of it. But, while we depend on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus for all things pertaining to salvation; let us remember the essential nature of "pure and undefiled religion before God, even our Father;" let us show our love to him by "visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction," and seek grace from him to preserve us "unspotted from the world." For nothing "availeth" in Christ Jesus, but faith, which "worketh by love," "purifieth the heart," subdues carnal lusts, and obeys God's commandments. (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6. 1 John 2:15—17.)

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—4. While the persons whom the apostle addressed, held the doctrine of Christ, and professed faith in him as "the Lord of Glory," most glorious in himself, and the Source of all that was honourable in men; they ought to take care not to show "respect of persons;" giving honour to some, and despising others, on account of external circumstances and appearances, without estimating the comparative value or worthlessness of their characters: for this would be very inconsistent with professing themselves the disciples of the lowly Jesus.—For instance, if any person, adorned with rings on his fingers, and costly garments, as one of high rank in the community, should come into their assembly, when they were met for the worship of God, as the Jews did in their synagogues; and another should at the same time enter, in mean, coarse, or worn out clothes, as a poor man: and they should pay great attention to him in gay clothing, accommodating him with some chief place in the synagogue, or place of worship; and contemptuously order the poor man to stand in some inconvenient place, or to sit on the ground at their feet, without adverting to the character and conduct of each: would not this prove that they were partial, or prejudiced, in forming an opinion in themselves concerning others, and were become judges, who were misled by vain reasonings and imaginations, by unjust thoughts and corrupt affections? For their conduct would show, that they deemed wealth and splendour, however acquired o used, to be honourable; and poverty, however incurred or supported, to be disgraceful: forgetting that "the Lord of glory" was pleased to be poor for the sake of sinners, to enrich them with eternal felicity. (Notes, 5—7. 1:1,9—11. Prov. 14:21,31. 17:5. Matt. 11:2—6. Luke 7:36. Rom. 12:14—16. 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 8:6—9.)—Some expositors, supposing that the passage thus interpreted could scarcely consist with rendering honour to civil superiors, as required in other scriptures, have endeavoured to explain it of partiality in deciding causes in favour of the rich, and against the poor; because some courts of justice used to be held in the Jewish synagogues. But had the apostle intended to point out so gross an iniquity, he would doubtless have spoken of it with far more decided severity. If such partiality were used in the determinations of those matters which came before the churches, it would certainly be condemned by what he said: yet the language does not at all relate to judicial proceedings of any kind; but to an improper respect shown towards some, and contempt expressed towards others, merely on account of external appearance.—No doubt this is very reprehensible, and the effect of a carnal judgment, how common soever it may be: nor does civil respect to superiors, or to those in authority, render such difference of conduct towards the rich and the poor, in religious concerns, at all necessary: especially when the rich have nothing but their wealth and splendour to recommend them; and the poor are persons of pious character and good behaviour. As places of worship cannot be built and maintained, without much expense; it may be proper that they, who contribute towards defraying it, should be accommodated accordingly: but were all professed Christians more spiritually minded, less disparity would be made, and the poor would be treated with far more attention and regard, than they commonly are in worshipping congregations. And we may conclude without the least hesitation, that if the apostle could witness what takes place generally in our days, in this matter, and give his opinion of it; he would repeat the censure that we were "become partial in ourselves," and "judges" influenced by evil thoughts, corrupt reasonings, and erroneous calculations; and add many like and even more severe words.—Our Lord, &c. (1) "Jesus Christ our Lord, and of glory;" not only, "our Lord," but "the Lord of glory;" the Fountain and Source of honour; constituting those related to him truly honourable, however poor. V. 5—7. The apostle endeavoured to fix the attention of his brethren on the subject, by inquiring, whether they did not know that "God had chosen the poor of this world." Were not his people generally of that rank in life, with only a few exceptions? (Marg. Ref. m. Note, 1 Cor. 1:26—31.) If the Lord therefore chiefly blessed the gospel, for the conversion of the poor, it must be evident, that he had appointed that lowly state for his chosen people, as the safest, most comfortable, and advantageous for them; as most conducive to their progressive sanctification, most favourable to their inward peace, and most suited to show forth the power and blessed effects of his grace bestowed on them. For he could have given them the riches and honours of this world, if he had seen that these would have done them good; but he had chosen them to be "rich in faith," partakers of all "the unsearchable riches of Christ," and all the "exceedingly great and precious promises" of the Scripture: and to be "heirs of the kingdom," which he had engaged to bestow on all those who were taught by his grace to love him and his holy ways; which comprised such a confluence of honour, authority, greatness, riches, and enjoyments, as no earthly kingdom could ever make claim to. (Notes, 1:9—12. Luke 6:20—26. 12:15—21. 16:14,15,19—26. Eph. 3:8. 1 Tim. 6:17—19. 2 Pet. 1:3,4.) It was therefore evident, that the Lord peculiarly honoured and favoured men of low condition: whereas his worshippers despised the poor, and slighted them, as if beneath their notice! Or, they "despised the poor man;" for the word is singular. (Notes, Prov. 15:21,31. 17:5. Ec. 9:13—18. Luke 2:1—14.)—Did they not also know that rich men were generally oppressors and persecutors, and dragged them before their iniquitous tribunals, to condemn them for their religion? And did they not often hear the rich revile and "blaspheme the name" of Christ, from whom they were called Christians, and which they considered as worthy of all honour and worship? (Note, 5:1—6.) Could they then imagine, that the enemies of Christ and his church, and persons of the worst characters, ought to be treated with more respect, on account of wealth alone, than their poor brethren and neighbours were entitled to?—This implies, that the apostle principally referred to the case of such rich persons as occasionally came to their assemblies, to whom vast attention was paid, whilst the poor were despised; whereas the latter were far more likely to profit by the word preached, than the former. He does not seem to have meant, that the rich, who were stated attendants on their assemblies, and pious persons, ought to have no degree of superior regard shown them; provided the poor were not despised and neglected.—One of the last observations which the author heard from the lips of a very wealthy and zealous servant of Christ, (John Thornton, Esq.) was this: 'Ministers in London bestow more pains to get full congregations, than to profit those who attend; and aim more at the rich than the poor: but they will always be most successful with the poor. These are two principal mistakes.'

V. 8—13. The apostle reminded his brethren, that they would do well, if they attended to and fulfilled the comprehensive scriptural precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," in the several parts of their conduct towards each other. This might be called "a royal law," because of its pre-eminent excellency and permanent authority; and because it was the law of Christ their King, respecting their conduct towards one another, and all men. (Notes, Lev. 19:18—34. Matt. 7:12. 22:39. Mark 12:28—34. Luke 10:25—29. Rom. 13:8—10. Gal. 5:13—15.)—It is of vast importance to observe, how often this abstract of the second table of the law is referred to in the New Testament, as a rule of conduct to believers; as this alone is sufficient to show the fatal mistake of those who deny the moral law to be the rule of our duty.—If then Christians had "respect of persons," treating the poor with contempt, and paying court to the rich; they evidently "committed sin," and acted unjustly, and consequently were convicted by the law as transgressors; as they did not show an equal love to their poor brethren. For, if they were obedient in all other things to the law, and only offended in one single particular, they were guilty of all; that is, they broke the law, and fell under its condemnation, as certainly, though not so deeply, by transgressing one precept, as if they had broken them all; even as a man is liable to the sentence of death, by the law of this land, who offends in one capital matter, though he be clear in all others. The chain, consisting of many links, is broken, when any one link is broken. According to the covenant of works, a single violation of any one command brings a man under condemnation, from which no obedience, past, present, or future, can deliver him: and, according to the covenant of grace, the allowed, known, and habituatransgression of any part of the moral law, as given to us from the hands of a Mediator, proves a professed Christian to be impenitent, a hypocrite, an unreconciled enemy, and a rebel against God; and that his obedience, in other respects, is not the result of a sincere regard to the authority and glory of God. For if it were, the same principle would induce him to a constant endeavour and purpose of obeying every commandment. The authority, which prohibited "adultery," forbad "murder" also; and the same was the case with every other requirement of the law: therefore a violation of any one of them constituted the man a transgressor, and implied rebellion against the Lawgiver. Some would perhaps object, that they "were not under the law but under grace;" and therefore they might be in a state of acceptance, though the law condemned their conduct in various particulars. But, though this, in a certain sense, was indeed the case with true believers; yet it behooved them in every respect to speak and act as persons, who were to be judged according to "the perfect law of liberty." (Note, 1:22—25.) For the whole tenor of revelation; and the gospel itself, by which men were set at liberty from condemnation, and every yoke of bondage, would condemn all those who did not repent, and forsake every sin, and obey the commandments of God, in sincerity and simplicity, from faith and love to the Lord Jesus. So that, if they habitually allowed themselves in the practice of any known sin, the gospel would adjudge them to be unbelievers: especially those who showed no mercy to their neighbours, inferiors, and dependents, would "have judgment without mercy," and be punished with the utmost rigour of the law for no man could be a true believer, whose heart was not humbled and softened into a compassionate, forgiving, kind, and loving disposition. (Notes, Matt. 5:7. 6:12,14, 15. 18:21—35.)—The exercise of mercy indeed might be ascertained by its "rejoicing against judgment," and by any one's taking pleasure in abating from the demands of rigorous justice, and showing kindness to those who had no legal claim to favour. Thus God deemed it his glory and joy, to pardon and bless those, who might justly have been condemned at his tribunal; his grace taught those who were partakers of his mercy, to copy it in their conduct towards their afflicted and offending brethren; and all, who were not taught to show mercy to others, must themselves expect to be dealt with, according to the severity of justice in respect of their eternal state.—What then must be the doom of the cruel oppressors and iniquitous tyrants of the human species?—Some explain the expression "mercy rejoiceth against judgment" to denote the cheerful expectation of a future judgment, with which the exercise of mercy to others inspires the true Christian's heart. But though this may be implied, it seems not to be the proper meaning of the passage, or construction of the words; for to "glory against," or "to rejoice against," does most properly denote, to rejoice and glory in obtaining the ascendency or victory over a competitor; as mercy is figuratively represented to do, over the severity of God's judgment, when they are justified and saved, who deserve to be condemned.

V. 14—18. It is plain, that the apostle here argued against those, who substituted a notional belief of the gospel, for the whole of evangelical religion; and who were ready to answer exhortations and reproofs, (as many now do,) by saying, 'We are not justified by our works, but by faith; we believe, and we have all things in Christ.' He therefore inquired of them, what it profited a man "though he said that he had faith, and had no works" of true piety and holiness; to which he could appeal as the fruits and evidence of it. "Could faith save him?" No doubt true faith, interesting men in the righteousness of Christ, his atonement and grace, saves their souls: (Notes, Mark 16:14—16. John 3:14—16. 5:24—27. 20:30,31. 1 Cor. 15:1,2. Eph. 2:4—10.) but then it also produces holy fruits, and is evinced to be genuine by its effect on their hearts and lives: whereas, a speculative assent to any doctrine, or an historical belief of any facts, essentially differs from this saving faith. The worthlessness of such a dead faith is here shown by an apposite illustration. If any poor Christians were destitute of proper clothing, or food for the day; and so in urgent distress, or in danger of perishing: and a professed believer, who was able to relieve them, should avow much brotherly love, and in very affectionate words express a cordial wish and desire, that they might be furnished with raiment and support by some kind friend; but at the same time should give them nothing towards the supply of their urgent necessities: would any man be so destitute of common sense, as to suppose these unmeaning expressions constituted that most excellent grace of "brotherly love," which Christ and his apostles so greatly insisted on and extolled? Or would a poor starving person be persuaded to account it any better than a cruel mockery of his misery? (Notes, John 13:31—35. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. 1 John 3:16—24.) What then would such a love profit, either the possessor or his poor brother?—Thus faith is most excellent and advantageous, when genuine and efficacious; yet that faith, which has no good works springing from it, is "dead:" and, as it is inactive and unfruitful, so it can by no means justify the possessor; being alone, and separated from repentance, love to God and man, and every other holy affection: even as the eye cannot see, if alone, and dead, being separated from the body, of which the seeing eye forms a living part. It would therefore be most absurd to suppose, that the Lord would approve such a faith, when no poor Christian would value love of exactly the same kind. So that a Christian, who was more attentive "to the work of faith and labour of love," than to the disputatious profession of certain doctrines, being questioned by one of another character, might say to him, "Thou hast faith, and I have works; show me, therefore, thy faith without thy works," if any conceivable method can be found of doing this; and in the mean time, 'I will show thee, and all around me, that faith in Christ influences and rules in my heart, by the works of a sober, righteous, and godly life.' Most copies read, "Show me thy faith by thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works."—'Thou professest to believe, and disgracest that profession by thy conduct; but do not expect to be considered as a believer, till thou showest thy faith by the good works of a holy life: and thou censurest me, as not sufficiently exact, or zealous in respect of faith: but I deem it better to evince it by my works, than by disputing about it.' Either reading warrants the same inference: namely, that there is no possible way to show that we really do believe in Christ, except by being "zealous of good works," from evangelical motives and for evangelical purposes; and where good works are evidently wanting, the most confident profession of the most orthodox creed, can only prove a man to be a well instructed hypocrite, who has received a system of doctrine into his understanding as true, but has never been so convinced of its excellency, as to admit it into his heart, experimentally, as the influential principle of his conduct towards God and man. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—16. Gal. 5:1—6. 1 Thes. 1:1—4. Heb. 11:)—"He has received the knowledge of the truth," but not "the love of the truth." (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:8—12. Heb. 10:26,27.)—'A wicked opinion having sprung up, even in the apostle's days, by misunderstanding Paul's arguments; Peter, John, James, and Jude, aimed in their epistles principally at this end; to vindicate the doctrine of Paul from the false consequences charged upon it, and to show that "faith without works is nothing worth." But indeed Paul does not speak of faith at large; but only of that living, fruitful, and evangelical faith which he says "worketh by love." As for that faith, void of good works, which these men thought sufficient to salvation, he declareth positively against it.—Peter calls it wresting; (2 Pet. 3:6.) because Paul was in truth of the same opinion with the other apostles, and held eternal life impossible to be attained by any faith, which had not the attestation of a holy life.' Augustine.

V. 19, 20. To show the vanity of such a faith as did not influence the heart and conduct, the apostle mentioned the fundamental article of all religion, the existence of one God, as the only Object of all worship and service, and as distinguished from all the objects of idolatrous worship. Now the professed Christian, before described, believed this important truth, but without making any practical use of it. No doubt he acted more properly in believing it, than those did who denied it; but of what advantage could this be to him, seeing the very devils believed it also? Nay, they trembled at the thoughts of the omnipotent power and righteous vengeance of the "one living and true God;" yet they continued implacably to hate his perfections, government, cause, and service. If any man therefore believed all the truths of the gospel, in the same manner, with the utmost exactness; he could not know them more accurately, or assent to them with greater certainty, than devils did. Would not then the vain antinomian disputer be at length convinced, by the testimony of an apostle, and such irrefragible arguments, that "faith without works was dead," worthless, and useless; like a dead tree, fit only to be cut down and cast into the fire; or a dead corpse, to be buried out of sight, that its putrefaction might not annoy the living?—It is vain to say, as some have done, that devils are not under a dispensation of mercy, and therefore they have no ground for appropriating the revelation, and promise of salvation to themselves. For the apostle is not speaking of the different circumstances of fallen angels, and fallen men; but of the difference between dead, inactive, inefficient faith, and that "faith which worketh by love:" and his argument proves, beyond all doubt, that a faith, which is of no better kind than that of the devils, cannot possibly profit the possessor, however he may be circumstanced: for this plain reason, because it is not that faith to which the promises are made.

V. 21—24. The apostle next proved his assertion, by examples.—Was not Abraham, the father of the Israelites, and spiritually of believers, "justified by works," when at God's command he did not hesitate to offer his beloved Isaac for a burnt-offering? (Notes, Gen. 22:1—18. Heb. 11:17—19.) Did not his works evidence the reality and holy efficacy of his faith, and prove him accepted before God? The attentive reader must see in what a powerful manner his faith in the promises of God operated to produce good works, in obedience to his commands, in the most trying circumstances, universally, and without reserve. Thus "by works was his faith made perfect;" as the tree is in its perfect state, when grown to maturity, and loaded on every branch with abundance of valuable fruit: and the scripture was fulfilled, which declared that "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness." (Notes, Gen. 15:5, 6. Rom. 6:1—3,9—25. Gal. 3:6—14,26—29. Heb. 6:13—20. 11:8—16.) In consequence of this he was admitted to such a state of peace and intimate communion with God, that he was honoured with the privileges and appellation of "the friend of God," or "lover of God." (Marg. Ref. k.)—Abraham's justification by faith took place many years before he was commanded to sacrifice Isaac: but his obedience in that respect proved him to be a sound character, and justified him as a true believer, and a devoted servant of God. So that it was evident there was a good and important sense, in which "a man was justified by works and not by faith only;" as his works must be appealed to, for the justification of his professed faith, before men; and as they will be adduced before the tribunal of God, to distinguish true believers from hypocrites: (Notes, Matt. 25:34—46. 2 Cor. 5:3—12.) nor will faith justify any man before God, who is not thus justified before the world by his works also. Not that this will be a second justification by works, in the sense for which many contend; as the redemption and righteousness of Christ, depended on by living faith, can alone "justify a sinner before God," from first to last: but the good works of the true believer, from the time when he received Christ, to that of his death, how long or how short soever that space may be, will suffice to distinguish his living faith from the dead faith of mere professors, to justify him against every charge of hypocrisy; and to prove him entitled "to the gift of God, even eternal life through Jesus Christ."

V. 25, 26. In like manner even Rahab, who had been a harlot, was "justified by works," when her faith wrought by love to the people of JEHOVAH, and she entertained the messengers, and dismissed them in peace "by another way" than their pursuers had gone: and this she did at the hazard of her life. (Notes, Josh. 2: Heb. 11:31.) Her conduct proved her faith to be living and influential; it showed that she did indeed believe with her heart, and not merely by an inefficacious assent of the understanding.—For, as the human body, when destitute of the spirit or soul, is a mere dead corpse, without motion or activity, however exactly formed in every part, and thus differs essentially from a living man; even so "faith without works" is a dead carcass, not only worthless, but polluting and offensive.—It is unnecessary to use further arguments to prove the consistency of James' doctrine with that of the apostle Paul. St. Paul evidently meant, that faith alone interested a sinner in the mercy of God, through the redemption and righteousness of Christ, for justification: but the faith of which he spoke, "wrought by love" "constraining to obedience," and was connected with a new creation unto holiness. St. James meant, that no faith, which was not productive of good works, could justify a man before God: that a speculative assent, or an indolent reliance, separate from repentance, diligence in the use of appointed means, and holy obedience, "was dead" and unprofitable; and that, consequently, there was a sound sense in which a man might be said to be justified by his works, and in perfect consistency with "his faith being imputed to him for righteousness;" as in the case of Abraham. But St. Paul opposed those who objected to the doctrine of justification by faith, and St. James wrote against such as perverted it. Both views of the subject are useful to the humble, upright, and attentive: but the Lord sees good that the self-wise, the proud, the heedless, and the licentious, should have somewhat to cavil at and stumble over. Indeed the same interpretation, which is necessary to render one part of these verses consistent with another; at the same time renders them consistent with the doctrine of St. Paul, concerning justification by faith. (23)—'It is one thing to say, that the faith which is without works "is dead," and another to say, that faith is dead without works; as if faith derived its life and power from works; which is not less ... absurd than if we should say that the body is dead without sense and motion, as if sense and motion were the cause of life; when we should say, that the body, which is without sense and motion, is dead: for the cause is understood from the necessary effects; and works are the evidences and effects of living faith, and not the cause of it.' Beza.—The apostle frequently calls the faith which does not justify dead but he does not use the word living; and some persons are so absurd as to ask what we mean by living faith! The simple answer is, 'We mean that faith which is not dead; but active, operative, influential,' like a "lively" or living "hope." (Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The Lord Jesus is the true Fountain of honour; and they are the most honourable who best serve him, and most resemble him, whatever their external rank or appearance may be. But how difficult is it for us to divest ourselves of carnal reasonings, and corrupt prejudices, in such matters; and to give due respect to superiors, without a partial regard to the affluence and splendour, which too often are the appendages, or heralds, of vice and folly! But if this does not become the disciple of the lowly Jesus; it is still more criminal to treat the poor with contempt, because of their mean garments, and indigent circumstances; when perhaps they are adorned with wisdom and grace, angels delight in ministering to them, and Christ rejoices over them to do them good. (Notes, Prov. 14:21,22,31. 17:5.) We should watch and pray against so corrupt a judgment, and such evil thoughts, and false reasonings, in all cases; but especially in the worship of God, before whom "the rich and the poor meet together," and are regarded entirely according to their characters, and not in the least according to their rank. (Note, Prov. 22:2.) It is greatly to be desired, that every degree or appearance of the evil here reproved, could be removed from our congregations; and that we should more constantly remember, that "God hath chosen the poor of this world, to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to those who love him."—The poor should hence learn to seek these riches and honours, and the assurance of them, with increasing earnestness; to be contented in their low estate, to rejoice in their spiritual privileges, to be cheerful in the humble duties of their station, to be thankful for their advantages; and to pray for their rich neighbours, that they may not be satisfied with a perishing inheritance. The rich also should learn to "rejoice with trembling," in their perilous pre-eminence, (Note, Ps. 2:11—12.) not to trust in their earthly treasures, and not to despise their poor brethren; but to seek the true riches, and to improve their talents with a constant recollection of the approaching season, when they must "give an account of their stewardship," and be no longer stewards. For soon the condition of the wealthy oppressor, persecutor, and blasphemer of Christ, and that of the poor despised believer, will be reversed; when the latter will be comforted, and the former tormented, for evermore. (Notes, Luke 16:1—8,19—31.)

V. 8—13. We ought in all things to observe and endeavour to fulfil "the royal law of loving our neighbour as ourselves:" "but if we have respect of persons, we commit sin, and are convicted as transgressors," even though we be not guilty of any gross violation of justice and truth. If our obedience be sincere, it will be universal, as far as we are acquainted with our Lord's will; for the same authority is opposed and affronted, whatever command is broken.—In vain do men urge that they are "not under the law," whilst they allow themselves in known sin: the very gospel will consign them over to the righteous vengeance of God, and all the curses of the law will be executed upon them, with a tremendous increase of punishment, for having "sinned on, that grace might abound." But the hardhearted, selfish, implacable and oppressive professor of Christianity, has the greatest cause to tremble: for if "he shall have judgment without mercy, who hath shown no mercy;" the meanest slave, who ever was whipped and worked to death, must be considered as happy, compared with his haughty, cruel tyrant: and this will sufficiently appear, "when the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." (Notes, Is. 26:20,21.)

V. 14—26. Vain men, while neglecting "judgment, mercy, and the love of God," (Note, Matt. 23:23,24.) quiet their consciences, and ward off reproof, by speaking of faith, of grace, of salvation; but God will no more regard their heartless assent to truth, or their indolent, presumptuous reliance on his mercy, than their hollow expressions of love to their poor destitute neighbours. Let no man deceive himself: "faith, being alone," and not productive of good works, is no better than the faith of devils, and will leave the possessor in their company to all eternity. Would we have our inheritance with Abraham, "the friend of God;" (Note, John 15:12—16.) we must both believe his promise, trust his mercy, and obey his commandment: or else "publicans and harlots will enter heaven before us:" and a believing Rahab shall be "justified by her works," and distinguished from all open unbelievers, and from all those whose faith was dead, before the assembled world; when many disputers for orthodox creeds, which they have disgraced by their lives, shall "have their portion with the workers of iniquity, in outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth."

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. The word, rendered "masters," evidently signifies teachers. Indeed, that is the obvious meaning of the word, when used concerning any of the Jewish scribes, and of our Lord himself. Some ought to be "teachers;" but none ought to domineer, usurp authority in the church, or indulge a censorious, arrogant temper. —When the apostle forbids many to be such, he seems to allow that some may; and, consequently, I think "teachers" ought to be explained in an innocent sense.' Doddridge.—An arrogant, self-preferring, dogmatical temper, whether it led men, without a proper call or suitable qualifications, to aspire to the office of teachers, or whether it induced them to assume pre-eminence in other ways, was the general object of the apostle's reprehension: though the former, as the effect of such a temper, seems to have been principally intended. (Notes, Matt. 20:20—28. 23:8—12. Luke 22:24—27. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) Many converts to Christianity would be desirous of the distinction of "teachers;" with a view to the credit and pre-eminence of that office, or from a mistaken idea that they could not glorify God, and do good to man, in other stations: while perhaps they were not duly aware of the weight and difficulty of the work, and the solemn account which must be given of it. But they ought to know, and seriously consider, that "teachers" must stand a greater, or more strict, judgment than other men; and that false, unfaithful, ambitious, and selfish teachers, would be subject to a greater and more awful condemnation than other sinners. This is also, no doubt in a degree, applicable to the case o. censorious, assuming, and domineering persons, in any station. (Notes, 4:11,12. Matt. 7:1—6. Luke 6:37,38. 3 John 9—12.)—Indeed, even true believers, though preserved from final condemnation, if employed as teachers, must expect to be called to a more strict account than their brethren. As their conduct would be more severely scrutinized by men, than that of others; so they would be more sharply rebuked and chastened by God for their offences, in order to the display of his glory, and the prevention of scandals in the church: so that every attempt, made by any of them, to force themselves into eminent and conspicuous stations, would ensure a larger measure of painful and mortifying trials. (Note, 1 Cor. 11: 29—34.) Nor could any man expect to behave so as to escape correction or condemnation; for in many things all offended, without excepting the apostles themselves: all frequently "tripped," or stumbled, in their walk; and the more men were advanced and distinguished, the greater would be their dangers, the more noticed their transgressions, and the more needful their rebukes and chastisements. (Note, Ec. 10:1.) Especially, it would be found extremely difficult, to speak so much and so often, as the public and private duties of the ministry required, without often uttering unadvised words, dishonourable to God, injurious to men, or the result of pride, anger, or some unhallowed passion. So that idle and evil words must be multiplied, in consequence of men's improperly entering into the pastoral office: nor could any wholly escape this guilt; though such as were duly called to the service might expect proportionable grace and mercy. (Notes, Is. 6:5—8. Matt. 12:33—37.)—If indeed any man were able to "bridle his tongue," so as not at all to "offend in words," but always to improve aright the gift of speech; he must be "a perfect man," able also to govern, restrain, and use all the appetites, senses, and members of his body, "as instruments of righteousness," in subserviency to the glory of God, and in obedience to his will; seeing he was found able to govern the most unruly of them all. (Notes, 1:26. Rom. 6:16—19.) But no man had actually attained to this absolute perfection; for "in many things all offended:" yet the degree of a man's wisdom and grace might be ascertained by the measure in which he was enabled to govern his tongue. So that, if nothing in principle or practice proved the contrary; he, who most avoided all improper words, and spake most to the glory of God and the edification of men, must be deemed the most eminent Christian: whereas falsehoods, boastings, revilings, and corrupt conversation, brought a man's character into suspicion or disrepute, whatever else seemed to be good in it.—The Jews at that time, even when grossly ignorant and vicious, were exceedingly prone to consider themselves as called and qualified to be the religious teachers of mankind: (Note, Rom. 2:17—24.) and probably the apostle saw, that many of the Jewish converts to Christianity were influenced by the remains of the same disposition, to aspire prematurely, from questionable motives, or without proper qualifications and weight of character, to the office of teachers or ministers; which he counted it needful thus to repress.

V. 3—6. To show the importance of the subject, the apostle observed, that the estimate must not be made according to appearance, but by the effect. The horse, though a powerful and spirited animal, was commonly directed by the bit in his mouth, according to the will of the rider, and his whole body followed that guidance; whereas if the bridle were not used, and that properly, great danger and mischief would ensue. tuous ocean, might generally be guided by "a very small helm," according to the motion of the pilot's hand. Even so "the tongue, though a little member, boasted" and gloried of being able to do "great things." When properly bridled and directed, it could produce the most blessed effects; but if neglected, the most fatal consequences must follow. (Notes, 7—12. 1:26. Ps. 30:11,12. 57:7—11.) For let any man consider how vast a quantity of fuel a small match, or even a spark of fire, would suffice to kindle, and what tremendous conflagrations might follow: and hence he might learn the importance of the tongue: which is, in fact, a fire to destroy all before it, and "a world of iniquity," comprehending in the abuse of it, all the wickedness of the universe, in miniature, or rather in embryo. Its situation and office, "among our members," is such, that "it defileth the whole body," and inflames or gives vent to all those corrupt passions, by which men are instigated to commit the several vices, of which the other members are the instruments. Nay, it "setteth on fire the whole circle of nature," through every generation, and produces the most extensive and prolific mischiefs all over the earth. For it is "set on fire of hell;" as the devil, working on the various lusts of man's apostate nature, and exciting men to express their abominable thoughts by their tongues, disseminates, from one to another, all over the earth, atheism, infidelity, heresies, blasphemies, impiety, lies, slanders, emulations, discords, and lewdness, in immensely various forms, more refined and plausible, or more gross and vulgar, according to the company in which it is intended to produce its malignant effects. From these sources all kinds and degrees of atrocious and destructive crimes continually proceed. (*Marg. Ref. See on Matt. 5:22. It is worthy of notice, that all the other passages, where this awful word is used, contain the sayings of our gracious Saviour himself!

V. 7—12. Every kind, or nature, of living creatures, however monstrous, ravenous, fierce, or venomous, on the dry land, and in the ocean, has been, and is, in some instances subdued by the reason, courage, and persevering efforts, of the human species; by which means the mischiefs, which otherwise would have been occasioned by them, are in great measure prevented. But no man could ever find out a way to subdue the tongue; or to hinder wicked men from corrupting the principles, polluting the imaginations, and inflaming the passions of others, by their mischievous discourse. No one, however wise, powerful, or excellent, has ever been able, by laws, punishments, arguments, or any other method, to stop the progress of this evil; which effects far more tremendous desolations in communities, churches, and families; and does far more to make men miserable, here and hereafter, than all the venomous and voracious creatures in the world, combined together can do.—The word, rendered tame, properly means subdue. It could scarcely be said that all kinds of seamonsters, crocodiles, and serpents, had been tamed, or rendered tractable, by men; but they have all been brought under subjection, in one way or another: whereas no efforts could ever prevent the malignant effects of the unbridled tongues of ungodly men. For "the tongue is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison;" the chief instrument, by which the desperate wickedness of men's hearts is propagated, to poison the principles, and inflame the corrupt passions, of multitudes around them.—With the tongue, indeed, true Christians bless and praise God, according to the honourable use for which it was created; and many do this outwardly, who are destitute of true piety. Yet with this same member numbers slander, revile, anathematize, and imprecate vengeance on other men, from the malignity and pride of their hearts: though men were first created after the image of God, still retain his natural image, and are capable of being renewed to a conformity to his holiness! (Notes, Gen. 1:26,27. 9:5,6.) So that, out of the same mouth the language of love, gratitude, and adoration of God; and that of enmity and rancour against men proceed!—Some indeed may plead, that they thus express their indignation against opposers of the gospel, from zeal for the truth, and against error: but these things "ought by no means to be so;" and every Christian, who acts in such a manner, belies his profession, and yields to the suggestions of Satan, and to his own corrupt passions. Indeed, it is an absurdity, which cannot be paralleled in all nature: for no fountain from the same opening sends forth water, sometimes sweet, at others bitter, sometimes fresh, and at others salt: and every plant produces uniformly its natural fruit, and no other. But pious, pure, loving, candid, sincere, humble, and edifying language, is the genuine produce of a sanctified heart; and none, who understand Christianity, would expect to hear curses, lies, boastings, and revilings from a believer's mouth; any more than they would look for figs upon a vine, or olive-berries on a fig-tree. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. 12:33—37.)—Curse, &c. (9) 'Perhaps the apostle in this glanced at the unconverted Jews, who . . . often cursed the Christians bitterly in their synagogues.' Macknight.

V. 13—16. The apostle had digressed from his subject, by showing the consequences of an assuming temper, and an improper desire to be "teachers;" but he here resumes it. If therefore any of those, into whose hands his epistle might come, were, or desired to be thought, persons of superior wisdom, understanding, and genius, and endued with much knowledge of the gospel; let them not think themselves buried in a private or obscure station, or indulge a proud, aspiring, and discontented spirit; but let them "show forth," by the general tenor "of a good conversation," in the several relations and employments of life, "their works" of piety, equity, purity, and mercy, "in meekness of wisdom;" exercising that prudence, which is characterized by a meek and quiet spirit, and inseparably connected with it, and with a readiness to forgive and be at peace with all men. (Notes, 17,18. 1: 19—21. Matt. 5:5. 2 Tim. 2:23—26. Tit. 3:1—3.) But if any indulged "bitter envying," or proud, fierce, and malevolent zeal, for their own party or sentiments, "in their hearts;" or so rivalled others for pre-eminence, reputation, or authority, as to censure, revile, and calumniate them, in a malignant manner, and to take pleasure in contending and quarrelling with such as differed from them; let them not absurdly glory in these hateful tempers and this ill-behaviour, as if they arose from a superior degree of holy zeal, boldness, or faithfulness: neither let them defame and "slander the truth," by pleading that such were the necessary effects of embracing, professing, and earnestly defending it; or that those were "lukewarm," who did not dispute for it in this violent manner. For "this wisdom," though it might have injudicious admirers, even among apparently religious people, did not "descend from above;" (Notes, 1:5—8,16—18.) but was "earthly," as it sought earthly distinctions and advantages, and was of an earthly origin. It was also "sensual," or natural, the result of such principles as unregenerate men are actuated by: and it was "devilish," being at first derived from the devil, and constituting the image of his pride, ambition, policy, sagacity, envy, malignity, and falsehood. (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.)—The word rendered sensual, is in the passage referred to translated natural: and I apprehend it should be so rendered in this place; for it seems rather to relate to man's natural depravity in general; than to his sensuality in particular, to which ambitious disputants are commonly less addicted than to malignant passions.—The apostle added, that "where envying and strife" are found, "there is" of

V. 17, 18 In contradistinction to the carnal wisdom above described; (Notes, 13—16. 1:5—8. 1 Cor. 1:17—24. 2:6—9. 3:18—23.) "the wisdom which is from above," even that wisdom, which God gives to his people, in answer to their humble and believing prayers, "is first pure," in respect of its objects, motives, and tendency; it relates to the holy and purifying truths and precepts of Scripture, and is derived from them and regulated by them: and it tends to holiness of heart, language, and conduct. As far as it can consist with this, and with steadily avowing the truths and obeying the commandments of God our Saviour, "this wisdom is peaceable;" the possessor of it is disposed to give up every thing for peace, except truth and duty; and these he will firmly adhere to, but in a peaceable and loving manner. It is also "gentle;" and influences men to be slow to anger, candid, calm, forbearing, and courteous. "It is easy to be entreated," and persuaded to what is reasonable, or forgiving; and to listen to the words of truth and equity, though spoken by an inferior, a child, or an enemy; and it is full of mercy, compassion, tenderness, and all "good fruits." (Note, Gal. 5:22—26.) This heavenly wisdom is also "without partiality," in judging of persons or actions: free from bigotry for one party, or against another; and from contending for one part of religion, to the neglect and disparagement of others; or producing that partiality to the rich, and that prejudice against the poor, which the apostle had before reproved. (Notes, 2:1—7.) Finally, it is free from "hypocrisy;" leading a man to regard the will and acceptance of God, far more than the good opinion of men of whatever rank or character.—Heavenly wisdom, according to St. James' description of it, is very nearly allied to that love, for which St. Paul contended: (Note, 1 Cor. 13:4—7.) and we may observe of both, that they are described, as they are in themselves; and that every man may ascertain the reality, or the degree, of his attainments in them, by their effects on his temper and conduct. For, whatever bigots and zealots may imagine, "the fruit of righteousness," or that good seed whence the blessed fruit of righteousness grows here on earth, "is sown in peace:" men of peaceable, loving tempers, preaching the gospel, or in any scriptural way endeavouring to make it known to mankind, adorning it in their lives, and watering it with their prayers, "sow the seed," which God blesses to the conversion of sinners, and the propagation of true religion in the world. It "is sown in peace," not amidst great noise and disturbance; and by those "who make peace," who are both peaceable and peacemakers, in the church and in the world. (Notes, 1:19—21. Matt. 5:9. Heb. 12:9—14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Did men duly weigh the importance and difficulty of the sacred ministry, the account which must be given of it, and the trials and temptations to which it must expose them; they would be less forward, than they sometimes are, in aspiring to that distinction. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:1.) Indeed all conspicuous stations must be connected with many painful and mortifying circumstances, and have proportionable responsibility connected with them: so that numbers, who occupy or intrude into them, will receive the "heavier condemnation" on that account. If then, the glory of God, the good of mankind, and an evident call in Providence, did not require the contrary; a wise and humble man, possessed of much self-knowledge, and knowledge of human nature, and the state of the world and the church, would choose obscurity and privacy, to be out of the way of temptation, to shun the danger of dishonouring the gospel; and to escape trials, as much as this present state will admit of it. Yet alas! however stationed, "in many things we offend all:" for a well informed Christian will readily acknowledge, that his rule of duty is perfect; but he will also know, that in fact no man on earth lives up to it.—Nothing is more arduous than the proper government of the tongue: and the minister, who is satisfied that Christ has sent him to preach the gospel, will trust in his abundant mercy, and all-sufficient grace: but he will also perceive, that no outward appendages of his work can counterbalance the additional danger of contracting guilt, to which it exposes him. Facts abundantly prove, that more professed Christians succeed in bridling their senses and appetites, than in duly restraining their tongues: and whilst we contemplate, with grief and astonishment, the horrible effects produced by this "unruly evil," "this world of iniquity, this deadly poison, this fire that sets the whole course of nature" in a flame, in every part of the earth, and has done so through all the ages of time, and while we recollect with admiring gratitude and joy, that the Lord makes use of this very member, when he has filled the heart with holy affections, to spread the word of truth and righteousness throughout the earth; let us particularly inquire, what use we make of our tongues. It behooves us to "bridle them," that they may obey the dictates of our enlightened understandings and holy affections, as the well managed horse does the rider, or as the ship is turned by the helm in the hand of the pilot that neither pride, passion, lust, nor levity, nor yet any temptation, may lead us to speak corrupt or unadvised words, or any thing contrary to the glory of God and the edification of men. As no man is able to subdue and tame the tongue, no, not his own tongue, without the help of divine grace: we are reminded to beg of God to do it for us: for the "things which are impossible with man, are possible with God." Depending on his grace, let us take heed "to bless, and not curse:" (Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Rom. 12:14—16. 1 Pet. 3:8—12.) let us aim at a consistency of conversation and conduct, and see to it that our love to men proves the sincerity of our professed love to God; and that our conduct, out of the place of worship, corresponds with our language and professions in it. For very many things are, even among Christians, that ought not to be so.

V. 13—18. Instead of seeking the reputation of wisdom and knowledge, by ostentatiously aspiring after pre-eminence: let us be careful to "show out of a good conversation our works with meekness of wisdom:" avoiding all bitter "envyings, and zeal, and strife in our hearts," as well as in our words and actions; not glorying in such things as are indeed a shame to any man, or scandalizing the truth by disgraceful contentions about it, and slandering it by pleading that it calls for this bitter zeal. Such wisdom is common enough in the world, and in the visible church; and it thrives here, being in its proper soil and climate; for, "it descendeth not from above, but is earthly, natural, and devilish," producing "confusion" and distraction in families, communities, and religious societies: "and every evil work." May the Lord then bestow upon us the "wisdom, which is from above;" may the purity, peace, gentleness, docility, and mercy, manifested in all our actions; and "the fruits of righteousness" abounding in our lives, evince that God has replenished us with this most excellent gift! May we avoid all partiality, respect of persons, narrow prejudices, and a half religion, as well as hypocrisy; and in our words and works, be employed as peacemakers, to sow that good seed, which yields "the fruits of righteousness" on earth, to the glory of God, and the salvation of men, and which best secures "the peaceable fruits of righteousness" to our own souls.

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. (Notes, 3:13—18.) The apostle is generally supposed to have, in this place, addressed the unconverted Jews; to the conduct of whom his language is peculiarly applicable, according to the history of those times. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive, that persons, continuing members of the Christian church, at so early a period, were guilty of the enormities here mentioned: though the passage, alas! is applicable enough to nominal Christians in subsequent ages. But the apostle seems to have cautioned his Christian brethren against envy, strife, and ambition, which gained ground within the church, by the example of the Jewish nation: and the still more tremendous effects which sprang from the same causes among them. He, however, employed such language, as would be a direct and pointed address to those Jews who might happen to read his epistle; when he said, "From whence come wars and fightings among you?" For it was evident, that "the nation was divided against itself," and split into parties, which destroyed each other by most furious contests; while their continual insurrections were drawing down destruction on them from the Roman power. Did not these calamities arise from their "lusts," or their pleasures? that is, from those corrupt passions which they sought their pleasure in gratifying? These lusts warred "in their members;" either in the members of the corrupt nature, the old Adam, in which one lust warred against another, as all could not be gratified, and each strove for the mastery; or rather "by the members" of their bodies; which their carnal passions, working within, and overcoming the feeble resistance of reason and conscience, made use of as weapons, or "instruments of unrighteousness," for perpetrating their criminal purposes. (Notes, Rom. 6:12, 13,16—19. 7:22—25.) They eagerly craved worldly prosperity, and the several indulgences connected with it; but they did not possess them: and, in consequence of this disappointment, they were ready to murder, or actually did murder, such persons as stood in their way; yet they could not, after all, obtain the advantages which they so inordinately coveted. This, therefore, rendered them still more violent; and intestine discords and public insurrections were excited: but instead of prospering by them, they were the more impoverished and distressed, and reduced often almost to desperation; because they sought not the desired benefits from God by prayer. This seems to refer to the eager desires of the Jewish nation after temporal prosperity, and liberty from the Roman yoke; and to the violent and impious measures, which they adopted in order to obtain them: for these measures effected nothing, except the increase of their miseries; and they were hastening their own destruction, because they trusted not in God.—Some of them, however, it might be supposed, kept up the form of religion, and prayed for liberty from their oppressors, and for temporal prosperity; but they did not receive what they asked for, because they "asked amiss:" their very prayers were dictated by selfish and worldly affections; they were presented in a formal manner, and by those who continued to reject their Messiah, vainly expecting a temporal deliverer, whom they would gladly have welcomed. So that they asked for worldly advantages and possessions alone, and in order that they might spend and waste them in gratifying their passions. (Notes, Matt. 7:7—11. 20:20—23.)

Not merely feebly, or formally, but wickedly; for covetousness, or sensuality, lusts dictated their prayers. (Prov. 21:27. Note, 1:5—8.)

V. 4—6. The Jews were still the professed worshippers of God, and the nation had been espoused to him by special covenant: idolatry, therefore, and other direct violations of the national covenant, were spiritual adultery; and the rejection and crucifixion of the Messiah was the grossest instance of that crime which could be committed. They moreover idolized worldly interests and pleasures, in the most excessive manner: as if these had been their portion, and religion no farther valuable than as it subserved that primary object. It is also probable, that many nominal Christians had renounced, concealed, or belied their profession, from regard to the world, to such a degree as to merit the severe rebuke contained in this address. Both descriptions might justly be called "adulterers and adulteresses," in respect of their unfaithfulness to that God, whose professed worshippers they were; though perhaps not guilty of adultery, in the common acceptation of the word; as no doubt many of the Jews were. And did not they, to whom "the oracles of God were committed," know "that the friendship of the world was enmity with God?" This was so evidently the case, that if any man resolved to live on friendly terms with the world, he must be "the enemy of God." The world, or mankind in general, being under the influence of Satan, and consequently governed by unholy maxims, the result of a carnal judgment and disposition; he, who will, at any rate, be on terms with the world, must not profess the truth, attend on the ordinances, or keep the commandments of God; above all, he must not be zealous for the honour, cause, and gospel of Christ, in that manner and measure, to which every believer is bound, and, in fact, disposed. (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. 4:3—12. Matt. 10:21—26. John 7:3—10. 8:41—47. 15:17—21. 17:13—16. Rom. 8:5—9. Eph. 2:1—3. 1 John 3:1—15. 4:1—6. 5:19.) "The friendship of the world" implies also an intimate alliance with the determined enemies of God, which no man can maintain, without habitual rebellion against him to please his enemies. (Note, 2 Cor. 6: 14—18.) To live in friendship therefore with the world, denotes that a man is carnally-minded, at enmity with God, unregenerate, unpardoned, and unreconciled; whatever his notions, convictions, or profession, have been and are. This must be the case, till Satan, "the god and prince of this world," is "dethroned," and mankind in general become true Christians. The servants of Christ are indeed friends to the world, or to men in general; and desirous in every way of doing them good, far beyond what any other persons are: but they cannot possess "the friendship of the world" in any measure, without acting contrary to the spirit and rules of their profession. Did then the Jews, or the inconsistent professors of Christianity, suppose, that the Scripture spake in vain, without truth or meaning, in all those numerous passages, which describe the ungodliness, selfishness, carnality pride, and malignity of the human heart, and declare that "the spirit, which" naturally "dwelleth in us, lusteth to envy," or enviously? For it was evident from the whole tenor of the Old Testament, that the natural disposition of fallen man, as instigated by Satan, so eagerly covets worldly things, as to envy all those who possess them, and thus prompts to ambition, contention, hatred, fraud, injustice; and that it leads them to envy, or to hate those who love God, as Cain envied, hated, and murdered his brother Abel. Must not then such persons be enemies to God, his truths, ways, cause, and people? Could they hope to reconcile "the friendship of" so wicked a world, with that of God? Or would they deem themselves his people, whilst evidently under the power of this envious spirit?—Some expositors, not finding any text in the Old Testament expressly declaring that "the spirit which is in us lusteth to envy;" and not satisfied with the general tenor of the Scripture on that point, read the last clause as a separate interrogation: "Do ye think, that the Scripture speaketh in vain" against this worldly mindedness? or, "doth the Spirit, which dwelleth in us, lust to envy?" That is, does the Holy Spirit, which dwelleth in all Christians, or that new nature which he creates, produce such fruit? (Note, Gal. 5: 22—26.) The meaning is nearly the same: but the first seems the true interpretation.—The apostle would further remind his readers, that "God giveth" his people "more grace," than to leave them slaves to such vile passions: and, having begun to sanctify their hearts; he give them more and more of the transforming influences of his Holy Spirit, to deliver them gradually from every evil temper, and to make them spiritual in all their affections and dispositions. So that, while he fights against the proud, the self-sufficient, the ambitious, the scornful and obstinate, the self-willed, the impenitent, and unbelieving; he shows favour and communicates grace to the humble and lowly, who are supplicants for spiritual blessings at his mercy-seat. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Prov. 3:34. Luke 1:46—55. 14:7—11. 18:9—13. 1 Pet. 5:5—7.)—The apostle quotes the Septuagint, except as ὁ Θεος, God, is substituted for Κυριος, the Lord. V. 7—10. From the preceding reproofs and arguments, the apostle took occasion to exhort the unconverted Jews, or nominal Christians, who should read his epistle, to "submit themselves to God." For he would certainly fight against the proud, as his peculiar enemies and competitors, till they were either brought to "submit" to him, or were destroyed: and, as he was ever "waiting to be gracious" to the humble supplicant. Let them then be persuaded to submit to his teaching and authority, to own the justice of his judgments and threatenings, to plead guilty and cast themselves upon his mercy, to resign themselves to his will, and to obey him as his willing subjects. In order to this, it behooved them to "resist the devil," and to reject his suggestions; whether immediate or by his agents, which tended to excite their sinful passions, or to prejudice them against the holy salvation and service of God: for if they resisted the tempter resolutely, in dependence on divine grace; and opposed to his suggestions the plain truths, promises, instructions, and precepts of Scripture; he would be driven from them, by the power of the Lord, and "flee" away as a vanquished enemy. (Notes, Matt. 4:3—11. P. O. 1—11. Notes, Eph. 4:26,27. 6:10—20. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.) Let them also "draw near to God," as in Christ Jesus, and upon a mercy-seat, by the prayer of faith, seeking reconciliation to him; and he would "draw nigh to them," to support, sanctify, comfort, and bless them. (Notes, Ps. 65:2. 73:23—28. Is. 55:6,7. Hos. 6:1—3. 14:1—3. Heb. 7:23—25.) But at the same time, they, who were living ungodly and wickedly, or practising any kind of sin, must "cleanse their hands" from it, by repenting of it, forsaking it with abhorrence, and renouncing all the worldly pleasure or profit connected with it. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. 1:10—20. Ez. 18:30—32. Matt. 12:33—37. Heb. 10:19—22.) "The double-minded," likewise, who were disposed to divide their hearts between God and Mammon; (Note, 1:5—8.) the men, who cleaved to the world and its friendship and interests, must "purify their hearts," in dependence on the mercy and grace of the gospel, from every pollution, that they might be prepared, in the fear and love of God, and by all holy affections, for a life of humble and devoted obedience. Instead therefore of proceeding in a thoughtless course of sin, or a formal and unfruitful profession of Christianity; "let them be afflicted, and mourn, and weep," on account of the dishonour which their sins had done to God, the mischief which they had occasioned to men, and the danger to which their own souls were exposed; and because of the rebellious ingratitude, contempt, and enmity, of which they had been guilty, especially in their opposition to Christ and his salvation. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, 5:1—6. Matt. 5:4. Luke 6:24—26. 23:26—31.) Their vain mirth and "laughter," as well as their scornful derision of divine things, ought without delay to be "turned into mourning" and "godly sorrow;" and their worldly joy into "heaviness," depression of spirits, self-abasement, brokenness of heart, and serious concern for their souls. For, if they humbled themselves inwardly, and in the sight of God, by unfeigned repentance, submission to his righteousness, and acceptance of his salvation; he would certainly lift them up from their dejection, heal their wounded spirits, comfort them with his reconciled love, exalt them to most valuable privileges, and enrich them with everlasting glory and felicity; as well as exempt them from the miseries which were about to come on the nation.

V. 11—12. The apostle next warned his brethren, or those who professed and appeared to be Christians, to avoid detraction, slander, and uncharitable judgments on each other's motives, actions, characters, or state. (Notes, Matt. 7:1—5. Luke 6:37—40.) These things were expressly forbidden in the divine law; (Notes, Ex. 20:16. Lev. 19:16,18.) so that the man, who thus reviled, slandered, or decided against his brethren, did in fact slander, judge, and condemn the law itself; as if it were unjust, unnecessary, or unfit to be obeyed. This conduct, therefore, was indeed no less a presumption, than for a man to quit his station as God's subject, who ought to be "a doer of the law;" (Note, 1:22—25.) and to usurp the place of a lawgiver and judge, whose office it was to determine what ought to be commanded, to prescribe to men their conduct, to call them to account for it, and to pass sentence upon the guilty. But there was "one lawgiver," who was fully authorized, and qualified to enact laws for his church, and for the universe, to enforce them, and to vindicate their obligation and honour; being "able to destroy" the obstinate transgressor, and to detect the masked hypocrite, as well as "to save" the humble penitent: and to him all authority and judgment belonged. Who then was the poor worm, the wretched sinner, that, forgetful of his own deserts, dared to usurp the throne of judgment, as if he were the competitor of Christ; and to decide on the actions, and denounce sentence against the persons of his brethren, in a dictatorial manner; and according to his own rules, as if that were his province and duty? Nothing can more completely demonstrate any proposition, than this passage demonstrates that the moral law is the believer's rule of duty; and that every word or action, which dishonours the law of God, is rebellion, if not blasphemy, against our one Lawgiver and Judge. At the same time, it exposes in a most striking manner, the wickedness of that presumptuous, rash, and censorious way, in which zealots and bigots condemn and anathematize those who in any respect differ from them; to the immense scandal of the gospel and disturbance of the church: and this conduct in fact is almost always found to accompany antinomian tenets, and is perfectly congenial to them; though not confined to those who adopt them.—The coincidence of St. James' exhortation, with that of the apostle of the Gentiles, in the fourteenth chapter of his Epistle to the Romans, is well worthy of our special notice: for it is generally supposed, that St. James here refers to the same subject, namely, the difference of opinion and conduct between the Jewish and Gentile converts, concerning meats and days, and the other ceremonies of the law. (Note, Rom. 14:1—12.)

V. 13—17. The apostle next proceeds to reprove and expose the self-sufficiency, worldly spirit, and unbelieving irreligious language, which were manifested by many in another way. The expression, "Go to now," or "Come now," here implied strong disapprobation, and a call to any one to consider the absurdity, or ungodliness, of his conduct. (Marg. Ref. l.) The persons reproved were eager in pursuing worldly advantages, pleased with the sagacious plans which they had formed for obtaining them, and sanguine in expecting success: but they neither considered the shortness and uncertainty of life, nor their entire dependence on God in every thing. Thus some would say, 'We shall set out to day, or to-morrow, and go to such a city, where we purpose to reside for a year, and by carrying on such or such a trade, we expect to enrich ourselves.' Whereas, they could not know what might take place respecting them, even on the morrow, or for a single day. (Notes, Prov. 27:1. Is. 56:9—12. Luke 12:13—21.) For indeed "what were their lives' to be compared unto, but a vapour, or luminous meteor which, gliding through the air in the night, may perhaps appear beautiful for a moment, but then vanishes for ever? So short, unreal, unsubstantial, uncertain, and fading was human life, and all the splendour, prosperity, or enjoyments which attended on it: though an eternity of bliss or woe, to each of them, must be determined according to their conduct during this fleeting moment! (Notes, 1:9—11. Job 7:7—11. 9:25—35. Ps. 39:5,6. 90:3—10. 103:15—18. 1 Cor. 7:29—31. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.)—They ought therefore to say with serious recollection, submission to God, and indifference about earthly things, "If the Lord will, I shall live, and do this or that:" 'It is in the line of my duty, and if he spare my life, I shall go about it according to his commandments, and in dependence on him; and he will prosper the design so far as it is for my real good.' But, as the persons here reproved, "rejoiced," or gloried "in their boastings" concerning the policy of their schemes, and their prospect and confident expectation of success; they must be reminded that "all such glorying was evil;" the result of a proud, worldly, unbelieving, and ungodly disposition; self-idolatry, as well as idolizing of the world, and forgetfulness of God, of death, and of a future judgment. (Notes, Jer. 9:23,24. 1 Cor. 5:6—8. 2 Cor. 10:12—18. Gal. 2:11—14.)—This heathen temper and conduct was far less excusable in them than in the Gentiles: (Notes, Matt. 6:26—32. 1 Thes. 4:1—5.) for, having the word of God and the instructions of his ministers, they could not but know, that they ought to be spiritually-minded, and "to acknowledge God in all their ways:" if therefore they knew, in this and other things, what the "good and perfect will of God" was, and yet did not obey it; their omission would be emphatically sinful, and expose them to severe rebukes or final condemnation.—This is a rule universally applicable; and every man ought most carefully to consider it; especially in respect of sins of omission, which the conscience does not so readily remonstrate against, as it does against those of commission. (Notes, Luke 12:47,48. John 13:12—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. All the wars, murders, massacres, persecutions, oppressions, and bloody contests, which ever desolated the earth, or harassed the church, from the beginning to this day, have originated "from the lusts" of man's apostate nature, and the perverse pleasure which he takes in breaking the commandments of God. The carnal affections of the heart, having cast off the rule of reason and wisdom, anarchy and civil war takes place in the soul; while one member of the corrupt nature wars against the rest, and they in turns prevail and are gratified; and while the members of the body are the instruments of their pernicious purposes, and obey the dictates of the tyrant of the hour.—This being, in one way or another, the case, with the unnumbered millions of the human species, (except the remnant who are "born again,") we need not wonder at the confusion, crimes, and miseries, which have, in every age, abounded in all parts of the world; though we ought deeply to mourn over them.—But satisfaction cannot be found in ungodliness, whatever method the carnal mind may select in order to obtain it. In respect of spiritual and eternal blessings, it may be said of very many, "Ye have them not because ye ask not" or "because ye ask amiss;" yet all who ask in sincerity will surely receive; and the humble "prayer of faith" is the best means of obtaining all desirable success in temporal things. But if men ask worldly prosperity and affluence, that they may gratify their lusts, and waste the bounty of God in violating his commandments; they pray wickedly, and their requests will either be rejected, or they will receive the things for which they prayed as a scourge, or a curse.—Alas! how many nominal Christians might be addressed in the apostle's words, "as adulterers and adulteresses," both literally and spiritually! And yet, how would they be disgusted and enraged, if a minister were to accost them in such language, however justly and scripturally applied! But, in whatever terms the offensive truth be conveyed, we are bound to declare, most perspicuously, that "the friendship of the world is enmity against God; and that whosoever willeth and purposeth to be the friend of the world, he is the enemy of God." Such a profession of the gospel, as gives no offence to a "world that lieth in wickedness," will leave a man to perish with the enemies of Christ. Let us then endeavour to be friends to mankind, and to do good to all men; and, at the same time, to disregard the friendship or enmity of the world, to refuse conformity to its vain fashions, (Note, Rom. 12:2.) to separate from the intimate society of ungodly men, and to profess the truths and obey the precepts of Christ; not inquiring how far we may do it without incurring reproach, contempt, opprobrious names, or other kinds and degrees of persecution.—The envious, ambitious, aspiring spirit of ungodly men is totally contrary to the Christian temper, and the influences of the Holy Spirit: and "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his."—The Lord gives grace to his people; though he often denies them wealth and honour; (Note, Ps. 84:11,12.) and he will "give more grace" to those who long to have all sin mortified, and their hearts completely sanctified: but "he resisteth the proud," as his rivals and personal enemies: while he communicates the blessings of his special favour and grace, exclusively to the "poor in spirit" and "the broken in heart." (Notes, Is. 57: 15,16,20,21. 66:1,2. Matt. 5:3.)

V. 7—17. If any of our fallen race desire to be happy here and hereafter, let them "submit themselves to God" unreservedly, and in all respects; to his teaching as little children; to his righteousness as condemned criminals, casting themselves wholly on his mercy in Christ Jesus; to his authority and commands; and to all his providential dispensations concerning them. Thus let them seek his grace and favour; let them "resist the devil" and reject his temptations, "and he shall flee from them:" and let them "draw near to God" upon his mercy-seat, and he will draw near to save and help them. But repentance must be shown "by works meet for repentance;" the sinner who comes to God must "cleanse his hands" from the allowed practice of every transgression, however secret, gainful, or pleasant to corrupt nature: and "the double-minded" must cleanse his heart from hypocrisy, partiality, and worldly lusts; earnestly calling upon God to enable him for these things, which would otherwise be entirely impracticable. All sin must be wept over and lamented; either here in "godly sorrow," or hereafter in "wailing and gnashing of teeth." (Notes, Ec. 11:7—10. Matt. 8:10—12. 2 Cor. 7:9—11. Heb. 12:15—17.) Men may defer this inseparable consequence of wickedness, but they cannot escape it. Well may we then call on the gay triflers around us, to "be afflicted, and mourn, and weep:" as well as on the haughty and presumptuous, "to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt them in due time:" for this is the only road to everlasting honour and felicity; nor will the Lord, on any account, fail to comfort every penitent mourner for sin, or to exalt one who abases himself before him.—But, while ministers and Christians, in their several places, protest against ungodliness, impenitence, pride, unbelief, and all iniquity; they should carefully avoid calumniating, reviling, and judging others; or deciding either on their state or conduct; except when their duty to them or to others renders it unavoidable. Alas! there are too many professed Christians, who seem openly to quit the place of the servants of God, and doers of his commandments, to set up for judges, and to prescribe to their fellow-servants, or decide on their eternal state. Such men speak evil of the divine law, and defame it; while they vent their own passions, under the colour of zeal for the truths of the gospel. But let us leave them, and all others, to their own Master, remembering that "there is one Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy;" and let us be careful to judge ourselves that we may not be condemned by him. (Notes, Rom. 14. 10—12. 1 Cor. 11:28—34.)—Let us also watch against the worldly spirit and conduct, so common among professors of the gospel, who scheme, purpose, and speak, as if they were to live here for ever, as if this were their rest and portion, and as if "God were not in all their thoughts." Let us remember, that "our life is but a vapour, that continueth a little while and then passeth away," just when and as the Lord pleaseth; that the world is full of vexation and disappointment; and that we have nothing to do on earth, but to secure the salvation of our souls, to glorify God, and to "serve our generation." Then we shall cordially say, "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that;" and keep at a distance from the self-conceited and foolish boastings of ungodly men.—Let us learn also to reduce all our knowledge to practice; remembering, that in all things, "to him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin," heinous and aggravated sin; and that omitting known duty is as criminal as committing known sin.

dently meant a direct address to the unbelieving Jews, among whom the rich and great men of the nation in general were found. He wrote only a short time before the destruction of Jerusalem; even before those tremendous desolations, which Christ had predicted, and his disciples expected. (Notes, Matt. 24: Mark 13: Luke 21:) And as many of the more prosperous of his countrymen rejected the gospel, from regard to their worldly interests, and were become most atrociously wicked, he foresaw the speedy termination of all their enjoyments, and the most tremendous temporal calamities about to overwhelm them; as well as the event of their crimes in future misery, if they continued to the end unbelieving and impenitent. He therefore called on them, to come and attend to his words, and to consider the danger of their condition: that they might "weep and howl" with most doleful lamentations, on account of the complicated miseries which were even then coming upon them. (Marg. Ref. c. Note, 4:7—10.) As to their treasures, they "would not at all profit them in the day of the LORD's vengeance." (Marg. Ref. d—h. Notes, Is. 2:19—21. Matt. 6:19—21.) Their corn, and other perishable goods, which they had avariciously hoarded, were corrupted; or they would be of no more use to them, than if they were entirely decayed. Their costly garments, which they kept in splendid wardrobes, were consuming by moths; and indeed such a curse lay upon them, that they would soon be of no value. Nay, even their gold and silver, which should have been brightened by circulation, were laid by, till they were tarnished, as with rust, and the very appearance of their money would bear witness against their covetousness: whilst, in consequence of heaping it up, their enemies would have the richer plunder. The anguish also, of having it torn from them, would be a torment to their minds; and their guilty consciences would upbraid them with the crimes by which they became rich, and the bad use which they had made of their abundance: so that they would be tortured, as if the rust of their metals were converted into a caustic, to burn their flesh like fire. (Notes, Mic. 6:10—15. Hab. 2:9—11.) Indeed, with much wickedness and great labour, they had amassed treasures, for "the last days" of their city and nation, when God was about to execute tremendous vengeance upon them, for their personal and public iniquities; and when riches would no more profit them at the crisis, than [a]in the hour of death, and at the day of judgment;' so that in fact they had "treasured up wrath against the day of wrath." (Note, Rom. 2:4—6.) For, behold, "the hire of their labourers," who had reaped their harvest, and toiled to increase their wealth, had been fraudulently withholden, and it cried for vengeance from heaven upon them! (Notes, Lev. 19:13. Deut. 24:14,15. Job 24:2—12. 31:38—40. Jer. 22:13—19.) So that the bitter and loud complaints of the oppressed, against their cruel tyrants, were heard by "the LORD of sabaoth," or of armies, who was about to send the Roman armies to execute his judgments on them for their iniquity. (Matt. 22:7.) They had indeed lived, for a time, luxuriously and delicately, and had rioted in sensuality, as cattle in a rich pasture; and the pride and sensuality of their hearts had been nourished by prosperity and self-indulgence, "as in a day of slaughter," when many sacrifices were offered and a great feast was made; or rather, as the ox is fattened for the day of slaughter, and enjoys his luxuriant pasture securely to that very time.—But, above all their other crimes, the Jews had iniquitously condemned and crucified, with the suffrage, as it were, of the whole nation, that "Just One" who had come among them, even "Jesus Christ the righteous;" and they still perpetuated that enormous crime, by persecuting his meek and harmless followers. Hitherto he had not resisted them, but had meekly and patiently endured their injuries; and they had no pretence for their outrageous enmity and cruelty to him and his disciples. But he was about to come, and to execute most terrible vengeance upon them.

V. 7, 8. After the preceding awful warning and sharp reproof of the wealthy Jews, who were the principal opposers of the gospel, and peculiarly exposed to the approaching judgments of God; the apostle addressed himself to his poor, afflicted, and persecuted fellow-Christians; whom he exhorted to bear their sufferings, with resignation and constant perseverance, till "the coming of the Lord." He primarily meant the providential coming of the Lord Jesus, to deliver them from the persecution of the Jewish rulers, and to execute vengeance upon that devoted nation: yet he intended, no doubt, to lead their thoughts forward to the hour of death, and the coming of Christ to judgment. (Notes, Matt. 24: 25:)—They could not but observe, that "the husbandman," when he has tilled his ground, and sown the seed, with great labour and expense, does not reap the harvest immediately; but waits patiently, for some months, amidst the fluctuations of the weather, and continually adds further labour, as occasion requires; till the Lord, on whom the increase entirely depends, is pleased to "send the former and the latter rain:" (Marg. Ref. x. Note, Joel 2:21—24.) and at length the crop ripens, and his toil and waiting are amply compensated by the harvest. (Notes, Mark 4:26—29. John 4:31—38. Gal. 6:6—10. 2 Tim. 2:3—7.) Thus ought they to wait, with patient hope and persevering diligence, not yielding to weariness or desponding fears; but "stablishing their hearts" by faith in the promises of God, against all temptations to draw back, or to turn aside. For the time of their waiting would not be long; as in every sense "the coming of the Lord approached," and a most glorious and precious harvest would soon amply repay all their losses, hardships, and sufferings.

Be patient. (7) Μακροθυμησατε. The verb, and its derivatives, are used, for the forbearance which God exercises towards sinners, in delaying to punish them; 10. Rom 2:4. 9:22. 2 Pet. 3:9,15. of the same lenity, exercised by men; Matt. 18:26,29. Acts 26:3. 1 Cor. 13:4. Eph. 4:2. 1 Thes. 5:14. of the Lord's delay to rescue his persecuted servants; Luke 18:7. and of man's patient waiting for and expecting promised mercies, in persevering faith and obedience; Gal. 5:22. Heb. 6:15.—Coming.] Παρουσιας. Matt. 24:3,27,37,39. 1 Thes. 2:19. 4:15. 2 Pet. 1:16.

V. 9—11. It would also be wholly inconsistent for the Christians to grudge one another the transient advantages which some possessed and others did not; or to give way to envy, discontent, repinings, or resentment; lest "the coming of the Lord" should prove their condemnation, instead of their redemption. For they must carefully observe, that "the Judge" even then, as it were, "stood before the door," and was about to enter. Very soon would he decide between his true people and hypocritical professors of Christianity, as well as execute vengeance on their avowed enemies: and they ought to prepare for his coming, and leave him to plead their cause, without attempting to avenge themselves: without groaning under injuries and distresses, or murmuring for want of such transient benefits, as all worldly possessions must be. Instead therefore of copying the fierce passions of their unbelieving countrymen, who were ready to rage under their calamities "like a wild bull in a net;" they ought to study and imitate the example of the ancient prophets, by whom the Lord had sent his word to their nation, and who had been injuriously treated, reviled, and even put to death for their faithfulness, yet they had persevered with calm confidence in God and submission to his will, and with a meek and compassionate fortitude, among their enemies. They ought also to remember, that the apostles of Christ, and other faithful ministers of the New Testament, and all experienced Christians, "counted those happy, who" patiently "endured" affliction and persecution; not such as were exempted from suffering, or turned aside to avoid it. (Notes, 1:2—4,12. Matt. 10:21,22. Rom. 2:7—11. 5:3—5. Heb. 6:13—15. 10:35—39. 12:2—8.) They had often "heard of the patience of Job," under the most complicated and aggravated distresses which could be imagined; and how he steadfastly adhered to God, and determined to hope in him in his utmost extremity, notwithstanding the excessive confusion into which his temptations had thrown his mind. And they perceived, that the end of his afflictions, and the temporal and spiritual advantages which he derived from them, sufficiently demonstrated that the Lord was most tenderly compassionate and propense to mercy, even when he most heavily afflicted, or sharply tried,

14 Is any sick among you? let him call [s]for the elders of the church; and let them [t]pray over him, [u]anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord:

V. 12. "Above all things," the apostle called on those whom he addressed, to beware, lest their trials and provocations should lead them to swear, in a passionate, rash, or profane manner; in their own justification and to escape persecution; or by any customary oath, according to the general custom of the Jews, but in direct opposition to the express command of Christ. On the contrary, in their ordinary conversation, and at all times, when a solemn appeal to God as an act of religious worship was not proper, they ought simply to affirm or deny, and to establish their assertion or engagement, by a serious repetition of it when necessary. Or rather, their veracity and punctuality ought to be so well known and fully approved, that every one might be ready to credit them, and confide in them, without hesitation, or requiring the security of an oath; otherwise they would "fall into condemnation," for swearing falsely without necessity, or without due reverence of God or of an oath.—It is recorded that the Jews were remarkably guilty of common swearing, at this time; which might induce the apostle to enter this solemn protest against it. (Notes, Ex. 20:7. Matt. 5:33—37. 23:16—22. 2 Cor. 1:17—20,23,24.)—'It was a proverbial manner, among the Jews, . . . of characterizing a man of strict probity and good faith, by saying, His yes is yes, and his no is no: that is, you may depend on his word; as he declares, so it is; and as he promises, so he will do.' Campbell. 'We ought never to swear; but to be so universally observant of truth in our conversation, that our word may always be regarded as an oath.' Philo in Campbell.

V. 13. Whilst worldly men, under their afflictions, either yielded to bitter complaints and desponding murmurs, or sought relief in sensual indulgence, or tried to extricate themselves by sinful means; Christians should be excited by their sorrows, to pray more frequently, copiously, and earnestly; that they might receive from God comfort, deliverance, and a sanctified use of their afflictions. On the other hand when any of them prospered, or was cheerful in spirit; they ought to express their joy in the voice of praise and thanksgiving, and by singing the psalms, which inspired men had written for that use; or such songs of praise, as they or other Christians had composed for similar purposes: instead of running into the excesses of carnal rejoicing, or singing those frivolous, polluting, or profane songs and odes, which were used by ungodly men, when exhilarated, and desirous of expressing their joy and mirth. (Notes, Acts 16:25—28. Eph. 5:15—20. Phil. 4:4—7. Col. 3:16,17.

Is any merry?] Εὐθυμεῖ τις; Acts 27:22,25.

V. 14, 15. Sick persons were next directed by the apostle, to send for "the elders of the church," many of whom were at that time endued with miraculous powers; that "they might pray for" their forgiveness and recovery, "anointing them with oil in the name of the Lord Jesus," as expecting a cure from his power and love. And when this was done in that faith by which miracles were wrought; (Notes, Matt. 21: 21,22. Mark 11:22—26. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) the prayer, offered in behalf of the sick person, would be the means of saving his life; and the sins committed by him, for which the chastening was sent, would be pardoned. (Notes, Mark 6:13. 16:17, 18. 1 Cor. 11:29—34.)—As miraculous cures are not now expected, the symbolical action of "anointing with oil" cannot properly be retained.—It need scarcely be observed, that the extreme unction, used by the church of Rome, totally differs from the anointing recommended by St. James; for that is never administered till the sick person is supposed to be at the point of death, and no hope is entertained of his recovery: so that a spiritual benefit alone can be proposed by the ceremony; which on the contrary serves merely as an opiate, to quiet and stupify the consciences, both of the dying and of the living.—It cannot be supposed, that these miraculous cures could be performed at all times: but there seems to have been some impression on the mind of the person who wrought the miracle, and a peculiar exercise of faith in Christ for that purpose. But it might be proper for Christians, always when they were sick, to send for their pastors, to counsel and pray for them: though the visiting of the sick, by ministers exclusively, is not particularly spoken of in Scripture, as it might have been expected that it would. When indeed this charitable service is performed with prudence, tenderness, and faithfulness, it may be very useful, especially to believers, and to those around them: but the indiscriminate visiting, praying in the same words for persons of all characters; and giving the Lord's supper to sick and dying persons, without particular and appropriate instructions and exhortations, as it is too commonly managed, is doubtless of extremely bad tendency, and a relic of popish superstition and formality. For it not only gives a false quiet to many of those, who have then first begun to think about God and their souls; but it encourages others to procrastinate, under a delusive imagination, that a confession, a prayer, a ministerial absolution, and the sacrament, will set all right at last: without any previous diligence in the duties of a godly life. On the other hand, if nothing but a miraculous cure was sought, there could be no sufficient reason, why "the elders of the church," rather than others, who were endued with miraculous gifts, should be sent for. The plural number is used; and, where it could be obtained, the presence of more than one minister would be desirable: but it cannot be supposed, that this was indispensably necessary.—That any difficulty should be found, about the persons intended by "the elders of the church," would have been inconceivable to the author, had he never read any thing on the subject, except the New Testament: but some have supposed that the apostles themselves are meant!

Elders, &c. (14) Πρεσβυτέρους. Acts 11:30. 14:23. 15:2,6, 22. 20:17. 1 Pet. 5:1.

V. 16—18. The apostle next exhorted Christians to "confess their faults to one another." This may mean, either mutual acknowledgment of the faults, into which they had fallen, in their conduct towards one another, which would tend greatly to peace and brotherly love, if duly practised; or a communication, reciprocally, of their conflicts and experience, and failures, with a candid confession of those things which burdened their consciences. This, when prudently managed, would make way for them to counsel, encourage, and exhort one another; and be a direction to their prayers for each other: thus promoting their inward peace, and the healing of their souls, as well as the removal of the chastisements which they had incurred. (Marg. Ref. z.)—Such a confession of faults one to another, does not in any respect resemble the practice, which the church of Rome has absurdly grounded upon it, of the laity being required to confess all their secret sins to the priests, in order to their being pardoned and absolved. For thus, that order of men, who are in themselves no less ambitious, interested, and prone to vice, than other orders in the society, is put in possession of the secrets of families, nay, of councils and princes, of which they have made abundant use, to their own aggrandisement, to the enslaving of the laity, and for many other most mischievous purposes. Thus also they discover the weak and vulnerable side of almost every individual; which opens the way to their attempting and committing crimes of every kind. But "the confession of faults," spoken of by the apostle, is no more that of the layman to a priest, than that of a priest to a layman: it is reciprocal between Christians; and voluntary, that it may be regulated according to prudence and propriety, for the benefit of mutual exhortations and prayers.—To encourage his brethren to this beneficial practice, the apostle showed them the value and efficacy of prayer. When "a righteous person," a true believer, justified in Christ, and, by his grace, walking before God in holy obedience, presented an effectual fervent prayer;—that is, one wrought in his heart by the energy of the Holy Spirit, exciting holy affections and believing expectations, and so leading him to be fervent and earnest in pleading the promises of God at his mercy-seat, in behalf of himself or others;—it "availed much," in obtaining the blessings thus sought, being the means through which God was pleased to work his own gracious purposes, as really as any other which he employed for that end. Thus Elias, or Elijah, was a man of the same frail and fallen nature with others: and he was no more exempt from human infirmities, while he executed his ministry, than the apostle and his brethren were, though by a special favour he was exempted from death. (Note, Acts 14:11—18.) Yet he prayed, (under the influence of the prophetical Spirit, out of zeal for the glory of God, and to prevent the total apostacy and idolatry of Israel,) "that it might not rain on the land;" and in answer to his prayer, there was no rain for "three years and a half:" and at length, the calamity was terminated, in answer to his prayers for rain, after he had slain the priests of Baal. (Notes, 1 Kings 17:1. 18:41—46. Luke 4:23—32.) This example seems rather to favour the opinion of those, who supposed the apostle to refer to "the prayer of faith," as it respected miraculous interpositions: but the efficacy of that prayer, which is, in all ages, presented under the teaching and influences of the Holy Spirit, is throughout the Scripture so fully declared, that this exclusive interpretation is here inadmissible.

Effectual fervent. (16) Ενεργουμενη. 1 Cor. 12:6,11. Eph. 1:11. 2:2. 3:20. Phil. 2:13. It may be understood either actively, (as the middle voice,) or passively. Actively, it signifies efficacious, effectual; but this seems a mere tautology, being equivalent to availeth: or, it means energetic, implying the earnestness and fervency employed. Passively, it denotes the energy by which the Holy Spirit prepares the heart for genuine prayer. (Notes, Ps. 10:17,18. Rom. 8:24—27.) 'The earnest prayer of a righteous man, the effect of good affections wrought in his heart by the energy of the Holy Spirit, is of great efficacy.' Doddridge.—He prayed earnestly. (17) Προσευχῃ προσηυξατο. V. 19, 20. Among other important works of love, which believers ought to attempt by faith and prayer; the recovery of such professed Christians, as had run into dangerous heresies, or fallen into sin, was peculiarly to be attended to: especially as many evils of this kind had taken place among them. (Notes, Gal. 6:1—5. Jude 22—25.) If any one, therefore, had turned aside "from the truth" of the gospel; and had gone into some destructive path; and one of his brethren was instrumental to his conversion, so that he was at length established as a true believer; he ought to consider himself, as under immensely greater obligations to the person who thus restored him, than if he had wrought a miracle to heal his sickness, or exposed himself to preserve his life. And the man, who had been employed in this good work, ought to deem it a far more desirable service, than if he had been enabled to work miracles for the recovery of the sick; seeing he had been employed by the Lord, in saving an immortal soul from eternal destruction, and of bringing a perishing transgressor to Christ; that his atoning blood might "cover the multitude of his sins," never more to appear in judgment against him, or to prevent his admission into eternal happiness.—Neither this, nor any other good work, could "cover the multitude of sins," which had been committed by the man who performed it, by inducing God to pardon him for the sake of it: for the most successful minister needs self-denying diligence, lest, "after having preached to others, he himself should be a castaway;" (Note, 1 Cor. 9:24—27.) and the whole plan of the gospel runs counter to such an idea.—'Surely it cannot be the apostle's intention to tell us, that the turning of a sinner from the error of his way, will conceal, from the eye of God's justice, a multitude of sins committed by the person who does this charitable action, if he continueth in them. Such a person needs himself to be turned "from the error of his way," in order that his own soul may be saved from death.' Macknight. In no sense or way can it be said, that our good works, of whatever kind, "cover the multitude of our sins," or any of our sins; without either implying, that they purchase for us an indulgence, or dispensation, to continue in sin; or that they are efficacious in atoning for sin; either alone, or along with the blood of Christ; or that by them we become interested in his redemption and righteousness, and not by faith only. The words referred to, (for it cannot be called a quotation, the word charity, or love, being omitted,) are found in the Proverbs, in the Hebrew, not the Septuagint. The context there evidently excludes this interpretation, and the use, afterwards made of them by St. Peter, by no means favours it. (Notes, Prov. 10:12. 1 Pet. 4:8.)—'He shall save a soul from eternal death; and shall be the means that the many sins of that convert shall, through his true repentance, be forgiven and not imputed to him.' Bp. Hall.—The zeal and diligence thus shown might indeed be an evidence of grace, and conduce to a man's enjoying the comfort of the pardoning love of Christ, under chastenings and sorrows, notwithstanding his manifold defects: (Note, Ps. 41:1—3.) yet this falls vastly short of the energy of the apostle's words, and seems not at all to have been in his thoughts so that many learned men have laboured in vain to put this construction upon them.—As "there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth;" zealous Christians cannot want any inducement of this kind, to animate them in attempting so blessed a service, when they have any prospect of success (Notes, Luke 15:1—10.) Nor can they need any of their own works to "cover the multitude of their sins," who know the all-sufficiency of the Saviour's atoning blood. But the apostle meant to show his brethren, that this was a far more important usefulness, than even healing the sick by miracle: though nature would prompt them most to covet or value miraculous powers; and they might be led to overlook, or neglect, a much more charitable work; which even they who were not endued with miraculous gifts, might attempt and effect, as well as their more distinguished brethren. (Note, 14,15.) This would also continue to be the duty of all believers, and a most desirable service; when miracles had ceased, and even to the end of the world. (Note, 1 Cor. 12:27—31. 13:1—7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The rich, who are luxurious and haughty, yea, all who now scornfully refuse to mourn for their sins, will soon be forced to "weep and howl, under the miseries which are coming upon them." All their idolized treasures will soon corrupt and perish; except as they will rise up in judgment against them, and "torment them as fire" by increasing their condemnation. The doom of unfaithful stewards will then be very dreadful: but the cruel injustice and oppression, with which many treat their dependents and labourers, by whose toil and ingenuity they are enriched, and whom they leave to penury and distress, will cry for most tremendous vengeance, "in the ears of the LORD of hosts." What then will it avail them, that they have "lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton," and cherished their carnal hearts, as the fatted ox for the slaughter? They have only "heaped up" perishing "treasure," to leave it behind them; or "fared sumptuously every day," as a prelude to "lifting up their eyes in hell, being in torments."—Such warnings, however, when impartially given, will expose the servants of Christ to their contemptuous indignation: and thus prosperous sinners have often been excited to condemn and murder the righteous and unresisting disciples; as the Jews did "the Lord of glory" himself.—But let the poor and afflicted Christian "patiently wait for the coming of his Lord," as "the husbandman waits for the precious fruit of the earth:" the good seed, which he now sows in pain, and waters with tears, will spring up and soon ripen to a harvest of eternal joy. (Note, Ps. 126:5,6. P. O.) Let us then "patiently continue in well doing," having "our hearts established with grace," and realizing expectations of the great day of retribution.—It does not become Christians to grudge one against another: or to envy, repine, despond, or dispute: rather let us prepare to meet our "Judge, who standeth at the door," that we may not be condemned at his coming: for all our eternal interests are secure, if we have trusted them in his hand; and all else is a mere vanity, which will soon be done with for ever. May we then "follow prophets and apostles," "as they followed Christ," in patiently suffering affliction, and meekly bearing injuries: for they, and they only, are and will be happy, who endure amidst tribulations, even unto the end. The event will clear up the darkness of all the Lord's dealings with his people; and whatever they or others have thought during the continuance of their trials, in the end it will appear as evident in the case of every one of them, as it did in that of Job, nay, far more illustriously evident, that "the Lord is pitiful and of tender mercy," and that they are happy, who patiently trust in him, and keep his commandments.

V. 12—20. It is peculiarly important to the interests of genuine piety, that all who profess the gospel, should reverence the name of God, and keep at a distance from swearing, and the profane language, which abounds in the world: and from that insincerity which is intimately connected with it; that "their yea may be yea, and their nay, nay." Indeed such as neglect these things have little reason to conclude, that they shall escape condemnation when the Judge appears.—The voice of prayer should always accompany that of our lamentations, when we are afflicted; and our joy should be expressed in the language of praise and thanksgiving. We should receive pain and sickness as the chastisement of the Lord, and seek relief from him, whatever instruments or means we employ for that purpose. The counsels and prayers of the ministers and disciples of Christ are peculiarly desirable on such occasions: and we ought more earnestly to seek the pardon of our sins, and the healing of our souls, than the removal of our bodily sufferings. (P. O. Matt. 9:1—8.)—Christians may profitably confer together concerning their conflicts, sins, and temptations, that they may encourage, warn, counsel, exhort, and properly pray for each other: and they should never be backward to confess those offences which they have committed against their brethren; or to forgive such as have been done against them. We ought greatly to desire, and highly to value, the prayers of our fellow-Christians, and to abound in supplications for them; "as the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." Nor ought we to be discouraged from this duty, by the consciousness of our weakness, unworthiness, or sinful passions; as they, who of old received such signal answers to their prayers, were "men of like passions with us:" and we have as good reason to expect, that God will answer our humble believing requests for such things as he has promised, and as are really for our good, and for his glory, as Jacob, Moses, Elijah, Hezekiah, or Daniel had, or any other person who "wrestled with him and prevailed."—In the use of all proper means, every one of us should seek the spiritual good of our children, relatives, friends, enemies, and all around us, and the conversion of ignorant and thoughtless profligates and sinners of every description; as well as the recovery of such as have wandered from the way of truth and holiness; considering, that if in one instance only, during the course of our whole lives, and after ten thousand disappointments, we are made successful instruments in "saving a soul from death, and covering a multitude of sins;" the event is of so vast importance, that it will abundantly repay all our toil, anxiety, and disappointment; being far greater than the preservation of the lives of multitudes, or promoting the temporal prosperity of whole nations. (P. O. Luke 15:1—10.) Let us then, in our several stations, keep these things in mind, and spare no pains, and shrink from no self-denial, and be wearied out by no ill success, in so charitable a service; and the event will prove that "our labour was not in vain in the Lord."

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

We have had repeated opportunities of considering the character and apostleship of Peter, who wrote this epistle, and that which follows, as far as they are made known by the holy Scriptures. Much additional information concerning him, however, has been conveyed down by tradition, and by ecclesiastical history: but a large proportion of it is absolutely incompatible with the Acts of the Apostles, and many things in St. Paul's epistles; much more is dubious; and the pretensions of the church and bishop of Rome, as grounded on these records and traditions, are so absurd and extravagant, as to deserve little notice, or to require any further refutation. It is not absolutely certain that Peter ever was at Rome; though it is highly probable that he went thither, towards the close of his life: and that he was there put to death by crucifixion, at, or near the same time, when Paul, as a Roman citizen, was beheaded, during Nero's persecution. He wrote this epistle, probably some time before, to the Christians in the different provinces of Asia Minor. Many indeed, and some of high respectability, have endeavoured to prove, that as the apostle of the circumcision, he addressed the Jewish converts only: but Peter was distinguished, not only as the chief preacher to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, but also as the first preacher to the Gentiles. And as Paul, "the apostle of the uncircumcision," wrote to the Hebrews, and in all his epistles addressed the Jewish as well as the Gentile converts; we may well suppose, that St. Peter addressed the Gentile as well as the Jewish converts; though perhaps with a peculiar reference to the case of the latter (Notes. Acts 2: 10:) Indeed, the contrary opinion is founded on some passages in the epistle, which are capable of another, and more natural interpretation: while the apostle's language in other places cannot at all consist with it. It also seems evident, that he wrote to the very churches, which had been founded by St. Paul, intentionally to corroborate his testimony, and to confute those who maintained that his doctrine differed from that of the other apostles; and he sent the epistle by Silvanus, St. Paul's faithful and constant coadjutor; often indeed called Silas, by abbreviation; as Priscilla is called Prisca. (2 Tim. 4:19.) And as those churches consisted of converted Jews and Gentiles; and as the epistle of Peter conveyed instruction equally suited to both; why should it be imagined, that he meant it for the perusal of only one part of them? The epistle is dated from Babylon, in the remains or vicinity of which city it is probable a Christian church had been planted, perhaps consisting principally of the descendants of the Jews, who remained in those regions after the Babylonish captivity. For no satisfactory reason can be assigned, for supposing, as many have done, in ancient and modern times, that here Babylon signifies Rome. Language of this kind suited the nature of St. John's Revelation; but was wholly unsuitable to the date of a letter. (Note, 5:13.)—We here find the same great doctrines, with which St. Paul's epistles are replete, applied to the same practical purposes. And it is peculiarly remarkable for the sweetness, gentleness, and humble love, with which it is written; which indeed forms a striking contrast to the domineering pride and severity, that characterize the pretended successors of this sacred writer.—Various opinions have been entertained of the time when the epistle was written; but as no certainty seems attainable, it is dated according to the author's opinion on the subject, in which, however, he is by no means confident.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle addresses the strangers of the dispersion in Pontus, &c. with salutations, and thanksgivings to God for his abundant mercy, and the inestimable blessings bestowed on them, 1—5. He shows the nature and benefit of their trials, and the joy by which they were counterbalanced, 6, 7. Through faith, they loved and rejoiced in an unseen Saviour, and received his salvation, 8, 9. The ancient prophets had most diligently inquired into this salvation; angels desired to look into it; and the Holy Spirit confirmed and prospered the preaching of it by the apostles, 10—12. This should animate Christians to a holy and circumspect conduct, as the worshippers of a holy God, 13—17; and as redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, through whom they believed and hoped in God, 18—21. Exhortations to the pure and fervent love of Christians to one another; being brethren by regeneration, through the word of God, which, as "an incorruptible seed," endureth for ever," in the endeared relation thus formed, and in all things, 22—25.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The churches here addressed were situated in Asia Minor, (as distinguished from the continent of Asia;) and Asia (as mentioned separately) was the proconsular district, of which Ephesus was the capital city; (Note, Acts 19:8—12.) so that they were chiefly the churches which had been planted by St. Paul, and by the evangelists who accompanied or helped him (Marg. Ref. d—h.) The apostle called the persons, to whom he wrote, "strangers;" and some have laboured to prove, that they were 'proselytes of the gate,' who had embraced the gospel; as Cornelius and his friends are supposed to have been before their conversion. Others confine it to the Jewish converts, who were thus distinguished, as living at a distance from the promised land, among the Gentiles. But as Christians are "strangers and pilgrims upon earth;" and as the sojourning of the patriarchs, or of the Jews, in foreign nations, was a type or emblem of this pilgrimage; (Notes, 2:11. Heb. 11:13—16.) it is more natural to understand it of believers in general, who were pilgrims or "strangers," in every city or country where they lived, and who were "scattered" through the nations, to be as "lights in the world, and the salt of the earth." (Notes, Matt. 5:13—16.) These the apostle addressed, as "Elect," or "chosen in Christ;" "according to the foreknowledge of God." (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 11:1—6. Eph. 1:3—12. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) This eternal purpose and love and election of "God the Father" had been rendered effectual, "through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience," begun in regeneration, and carried on in the continued mortification of their whole sinful nature, and the progressive renewal of their souls to the holy image of God, thus preparing them for unreserved "obedience," from evangelical motives, to the commands of Christ our Saviour. This was accompanied with "the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus," or the continual application of the virtue of his atonement to their consciences, by faith, for the removal of their guilt, and the rendering of their persons and services accepted with God: as the blood of the legal sacrifices was applied, by sprinkling it around the altar, and before the mercy-seat, on the great day of atonement, or as the blood of the sacrifices was sprinkled on the people, when the covenant was ratified with Israel at mount Sinai. (Notes, Ex. 24:6—8. Lev. 16:11—16. Heb. 9:11—23. 10:19—22. 11:28. 12:22—25.) To these persons the apostle wished and prayed, "that grace and peace might be multiplied," according to the salutation generally used by St. Paul. (Note, Rom. 1:5—7.) Thus they were taught, at the opening of the epistle, to ascribe their salvation to the electing love of the Father, the redemption of the Son, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; and so to give glory to one God in three persons, into whose name they had been baptized. (Note, Matt. 28:19, 20.)—Elect, &c. (2) 'Those, who in their outward profession, and in the due judgment of charity, are justly reputed for the elect of God, according to the eternal decree and good purposes of God the Father.' Bp. Hall.—Sprinkling, &c.] 'Men are not easily convinced . . . of the deep stain of sin, and that no other laver can fetch it out, but "the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." Some, that have moral resolutions of amendment, dislike at least gross sins, and purpose to avoid them; and it is to them cleanness enough to reform in these things: but they consider not what becomes of the guiltiness that they have contracted already; or how that shall be purged.—Be not deceived in this: it is not a transient sigh, or a light word, or a wish of, God forgive me; no, nor the highest current of repentance, nor that which is the truest evidence of repentance, amendment: it is none of these that purifies in the sight of God, and expiates wrath. They are all imperfect and stained themselves, cannot stand and answer for themselves; much less be of value to counterpoise the former guilt of sin. The very tears of the purest repentance, unless they be sprinkled with this blood, are impure; all our washings, without this, are but the washings of a blackamore; it is labour in vain.' Arbp. Leighton. (Note, John 1:29.)

Strangers. (1) Παρεπιδημοις. 2:11. Heb. 11:13.—Scattered.] Διασπορας. John 7:35. Jam. 1:1.—This word may seem to favour the opinion, that the epistle was written to Jewish converts exclusively: but the apostle used several terms, taken from what had been said of that nation, in relation to Christians, where this opinion cannot stand. (Note, 2:9,10.)—Be multiplied. (2) Πληθυνθειη. 2 Pet. 1:2. This is not found in St. Paul's salutations: at the same time St. Peter does not add, "From God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ;" (Note, 1 Cor. 1:3.) but in his second epistle he says, "Through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord." (Note, John 17:1—3.)

V. 3—5. St. Peter, as well as his "beloved brother Paul," opened his subject, by calling on his fellow-Christians to join with him, in blessing God for his distinguishing mercy and grace, under the title of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." (Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) "Of his abundant mercy," or the greatness of his compassionate love, to the guilty, the polluted, and the wretched, even such as were "dead in sin and children of wrath, he had regenerated them;" and from this gracious change, wrought in them by his divine power, their repentance, faith, and obedience had originated. (Notes John 1:10—13. 3:1—8. Eph. 2:3—10. Col. 2:13—15. 1 Tim. 1:9. Tit. 1:1—4. 3:3—7. Jam. 1:16—18.) Thus, as "the children of God," they were brought to possess "a lively" or living "hope," active, influential, and invigorating. They were no longer left to be influenced principally by any of the hopes, which worldly men indulge, of obtaining satisfaction in temporal things; or to the presumptuous and inefficacious hope of mercy and salvation, by which formalists and hypocrites are deceived: but they were made partakers of a well-grounded hope of salvation, which was an active, living principle in their souls, of patient and cheerful obedience. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 15:8—13. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. Eph. 2: 11—13. Col. 1:3—8. 2 Thes. 2:16,17. Heb. 6:16—20. 1 John 3:1—3.) This regeneration, and the hope resulting from it, were consequences arising from "the resurrection of Christ." His atoning Sacrifice having been accepted, he had been raised from the dead, proving that he was "the Son of God," and that he had done his work on earth, and in order to the performance of his mediatory office in heaven: that, by communicating, through his intercession, the Holy Spirit, to give efficacy to the preaching of the gospel, sinners might be raised from the death of sin, by a continuation, as it were, of that power which restored to life the dead body of Christ. (Notes, Eph. 1:15—23.) Thus they had "been begotten or born again to an inheritance," which was of a very different nature from those which worldly men sought for. For earthly inheritances are corruptible in themselves, and in respect of their possessors; defiled, in respect of the means by which they are obtained, the use which is generally made of them, and the persons who possess them; and fading, as to the very trivial comfort, honour, or distinction which they confer, and its withering nature, especially as possession soon abates the relish with which the objects were at first received. But the inheritance to which the regenerate are entitled, and for which they hope, is "incorruptible" in itself, and they will be rendered incorruptible and immortal to enjoy it; (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—54. Phil. 3:20,21.) it is "undefiled," in respect of its pleasures, and the character of all those who partake of them; (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:10—13. Rev. 21:22—27. P. O. 9—27. Note, 22:1—5.) and "unfading," as to its satisfaction, glory, and splendour, which will be unalloyed, unsullied, permanent, uninterrupted, always increasing, and eternal. By regeneration, they not only obtained a hope of this inheritance, and the meetness for it, but also the title to it. "If children, then heirs." So that it was "reserved in heaven," out of the reach of all enemies and changes, in the abode of perfect holiness and felicity, "for them," even for the elect, or the regenerate, who "were kept," as in a strongly fortified and garrisoned castle, "by the power of God," engaged by covenant to fulfil his irrevocable promises, and the purposes of his everlasting love. (Note, Col. 3:1—4.) Thus, having entered through Christ "the Door," into this "strong Tower," by faith; and still exercising faith on the promises of God, and on his perfections as engaged to perform them; and this faith being kept from failing, through the continual intercession of Christ, and grace bestowed by him; (Note, Luke 22:31—34.) they would certainly be preserved in all dangers, and protected against all enemies, internal and external, unto complete salvation. (Notes, John 10:6—9,26—31. Rom. 8:32—39.) This was in all respects prepared and "ready" for them: but the appointed season of their full enjoyment of it was not yet arrived; so that it still remained, as it were, veiled: but it would be revealed, manifested, and publicly conferred on them at "the last time," even at Christ's coming to raise the dead, to judge the world, and to destroy all ungodly men. Which . . . hath begotten . . . again. (3) Ὁ αναγεννησας. 23. V. 6, 7. In the earnests and hopes of eternal salvation, true Christians, "greatly rejoiced," or exulted: at least, they were required to do so. (Notes, Rom. 5:1—5.) This was the genuine effect of faith, in proportion to its strength; though at the present, "for a transient season," they might be, and often were, "in heaviness," and dejected, through a variety

8 Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now you see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory:

10 Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you:

11 Searching what, or what manner of time, the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.

12 Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister the things which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the gospel unto you, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; which things the angels desire to look into.

13 Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace of afflictions and trials in their outward circumstances, through the remaining sinfulness of their hearts, and the harassing assaults of Satan. (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 6:3—10. Jam. 1:2—4,12—15.) These troubles and conflicts interrupted their rejoicings, by short intervals; but they were "needful," in order to their permanent good, and for the glory of God: otherwise he would no more have appointed them, than a kind and wise father would needlessly afflict his beloved child; or a physician would prescribe nauseous medicines, without occasion, to his dearest friend. For all these sorrows were intended to make a complete trial of their faith, that it might be proved to be genuine. They professed to believe in Christ, and to love him; and it was proper, that the sincerity of this profession should be ascertained, that they might be distinguished from all hypocrites. This was effected by persecutions, afflictions, and temptations, as gold is distinguished from base metal, as well as purified, in the refiner's furnace. (Note, Mal. 3:1—4.) But the faith of Christians was immensely more precious than gold, which is of a perishing nature, and can only purchase perishing things; whereas faith interested the soul in the "unsearchable riches of Christ," and the unchangeable promises of God, and entitled it to eternal felicity: so that the trial of it was proportionably more important and advantageous. It was therefore proper that it should be tried in the fire of tribulation, by which the dead faith of hypocrites was generally consumed; as they renounced Christ to escape the cross, and to secure worldly advantages. But the living faith of the regenerate was thus manifested to be genuine, by their steadfastly cleaving to Christ and his will, at any price; their faith indeed being increased and purified by the trial. (Notes, 4:12—16. Zech. 13:8,9. Jam. 1:2—4.) They would also have the comfort of it, and God the glory, at present; and it would be "found to praise, and honour, and glory," in the presence of the whole creation, when Christ should appear to judge the world; and when no degree of applause, or weight of glory, could excite pride, as they would do while sin remained in the heart. To this joyful event all true believers looked forward with serious preparation.

Trial. (7) Δοκιμιον. Jam. 1:3. (Note, Jam. 1:2—4.)—Tried.] Δοκιμαζομενου. See on Luke 12:56.

V. 8, 9. The Christians, to whom St. Peter wrote, had, in general, never "seen Christ" during his humiliation, and they were not at present admitted to see him in his glory, as they would at length do. Yet they loved his Person, his divine perfections, his human excellencies, and his mediatorial suitableness; they were earnestly desirous of his favour and salvation; they were thankful for his unspeakable love, and the benefits conferred on them: they rejoiced in his exaltation, and were zealous for his glory; and this led them to cleave to him and obey him; to love his people, ordinances, truths, and commandments; and to give up whatever intervened between him and their souls, or was his rival in their affections. (Notes, Matt. 10:37—39. 25:34—40. John 8:44—47. 21:15—17. 1 Cor. 16:21—24. Eph. 6:21—24.) This love of an unseen Saviour sprang from "faith" in him: they believed the testimony of God, by his apostles, concerning him and his glorious excellencies; and concerning what he had done and suffered for sinners, and his power, grace, and truth. By this faith they had intrusted their souls into his hands, and they depended on him to pardon, cleanse, and save them. From this "faith working by love," they derived a joy, which was so excellent, holy, substantial, and satisfactory, that it could not be expressed by words; as it was "full of glory," or glorified; of the same nature and effects with the glory and felicity of heaven. They shared this joy, in proportion to the degree of their living faith and obedient love; while they delighted in the salvation which was wrought by him, and in their rapturous discoveries of the glory of God, harmoniously anticipating the everlasting felicity of all believers in Christ; and while they possessed the earnests of this felicity, in the graces and consolations of the Holy Spirit, and in communion with the Father and his beloved Son. This faith, love, and joy in respect of an unseen Saviour, constituted the peculiar experience, and formed the distinguishing character, of real Christians who thus were assured that they should receive that "salvation of their souls," which was the end proposed by them, when they believed; indeed they were continually receiving that salvation in the earnests, comforts, and sanctification of it, amidst their trials and conflicts. (Note, John 20:24—29.)

V. 10—12. The "salvation," before spoken of, had been predicted by the prophets from the beginning: so that their writings were peculiarly worthy of the attentive consideration of Christians. (Notes, Luke 24:25—31,44—49. John 5:39—47. Rev. 19:9,10.) These ancient servants of God had themselves most earnestly and diligently investigated the meaning of their own predictions; not being able fully to understand what that "grace" was, which was intended for those who should live after the coming of the Messiah. (Notes, Matt. 13:16,17. Heb. 11:13—16,39,40.) They therefore searched, as miners do for the precious metals, that they might discover when, and in "what manner of time," those things would occur, which "the Spirit of Christ," who dwelt in them, did intend by the predictions which he suggested to them. For they did not know the full import of their own words, while they "testified long before," that the Messiah would pass through a variety of complicated sufferings, even unto death; and that he would afterwards be glorified, in his personal exaltation, and in the extent, peace, and duration of his mediatorial kingdom, the happiness of his subjects, and the destruction of his enemies. (Notes, Ps. 2: 22: 69: 72: Is. 9:6,7. 11:1—10 53: Dan. 9:24—27.)—The Holy Spirit is here spoken of as a distinct Person: and as "the Spirit of Christ," not only in that he spake of him, but as sent forth by him long before his incarnation.—Both in the express prophecies of the Messiah, and in all the typical persons, events, and institutions which related to him: his sufferings were uniformly represented as introducing his glory, and the glories (τας δοξας) of his kingdom. The prophets had been immediately instructed, that they should not live to witness the accomplishment of their own predictions; and that neither they, nor their contemporaries, would derive the principal benefit of their ministry, or enjoy the privileges announced by them. But they were labouring for the benefit of future generations: whilst they declared those great events, which had at length taken place, and had been reported to the Jews and Gentiles, by the apostles of Christ, who had preached the gospel to them; whose ministry was attested by the miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit, and rendered successful by his life-giving and sanctifying influences; and who was "sent down from heaven" to bear testimony to the performance of those prophecies, which he had of old inspired. (Notes, Mark 16:19,20. John 15:17—27. Acts 2:25—36. 5:32. Heb. 2:1—4.) In fact, these mysteries of redemption contained such displays of the wisdom, power, truth, justice, holiness, and mercy of God; that "the angels desired," with great earnestness and persevering attention, "to look into them," and to join in adoration of the divine Redeemer; like the cherubim who were represented as bowing down to look upon the ark of the covenant (Note, Ex. 25:10—21.) They, as it were, left the glories of heaven, to study the divine perfections, and to learn new songs of adoring praise, in the stable at Bethlehem, in the desert, in Gethsemane, on mount Calvary, and from "the church," which "God manifested in the flesh" had "purchased with his own blood." (Notes, Matt. 4:8—11. Luke 2:8—14. 22:43. 24:1—9. Acts 1:9- 12. Eph. 3:9—12. 1 Tim. 3:16 Rev. 5:11—14.)—The Spirit of Christ. (11) Note, 3:19,20.—'That is, say the Socinians, the Spirit in them, which spake of Christ, &c. But in this sense, he might as well have been styled the Spirit of Antichrist, or of the false prophets; because he also spake of them. So the fathers.—Shall holy prophets be so desirous to know the time when these things should happen; and holy angels to look into these glorious revelations? And shall we, to whom, and for whose happiness, this gospel was revealed, neglect, not only to obtain, but even to know, this great salvation?' Whitby.

V. 13—16. As the "salvation" of Christ had attracted the attention of prophets from the beginning; as it was "preached by apostles, with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven," and as "angels desired to look down into it;" it behooved those who were favoured with the gospel, to avail themselves of their advantages, and to make suitable returns, with all diligence and alacrity. They ought therefore "to gird up the loins of their minds," (Notes, Luke 12:35—46. Eph. 6:14—17.) by laying aside all carnal prejudices and all anxious cares about the things of this life, with such occupations, desires, and pursuits, as might prevent their clearly understanding, cordially choosing, and cheerfully obeying the word of truth; and using all means of removing impediments, of invigorating holy affections, and of animating themselves and each other, in diligently serving and patiently suffering for Christ. (Notes, Heb. 12:1—3.) They were also especially required to be "sober," serious, considerate, moderate, and temperate in all things, vigilant, and steadfast in the faith: "hoping perfectly," or, "to the end;" that, notwithstanding all inward conflicts and outward discouragements, the Lord would fulfil his promises, and bring them to his eternal glory; entirely relying on his omnipotence, omniscience, and infinite perfections, to sanctify, protect, and uphold them: and to save them, in all cases, and against all enemies. Thus they should "hold fast the blessed hope" of that "grace," or free unmerited favour, which will "be brought to" all true Christians, and publicly conferred on them, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed, to judge the world and destroy the wicked. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—40. 1 Thes. 4:13—18. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 1 Tim. 6:13—16. 2 Tim. 4:6—8. Heb. 9:27,28. 2 Pet. 3:10—13. 1 John 2:26—29.) They had indeed been "children of disobedience" and "of wrath," but, being born of God, they had become "children of obedience," and disposed to obey their heavenly Father. This was their profession and character: and, in consistency with it, they must not order their conduct and discourse, or form their plans, in any respect, according to the maxims of the world, or the lusts which they had obeyed and indulged, when they were ignorant of God and true religion: as both Jews and Gentiles had done, while unregenerate; being destitute of any humbling or spiritual knowledge of divine things. (Notes, John 8:54—59. 16:1—3.) But as this blessed change had taken place in them, by the efficacious calling of God, who, being perfectly holy in himself, had purposed to make them happy in his holy service and favour; so they ought now to "be holy in" every part of their temper, conduct, and conversation, in imitation of his holiness, and in conformity to it. This had been required of Israel under the law; (Notes, Lev. 11:41—45. 19:2.) and without this, they could not comfortably walk with God, acceptably worship him at present, or enjoy heaven at last. (Note, Heb. 12:14.)

Be sober. (13) Νηφοντες. 4:7. 5:8. 1 Thes. 5:6,8. 2 Tim. 4:5.—To the end.] Τελειως. Here only. Entirely, perfectly, perseveringly.—Obedient children. (14) Τεκνα υπακοης. Eph. 2:2,3 5:6.—Fashioning yourselves.] Συσχηματιζομενοι. Note, Rom 12.2.

V. 17—21. Seeing they, to whom the apostle wrote, now "called on the Father" of the Lord Jesus, and their Father in him they ought to remember, that "without respect of persons, he judged according to every man's work." (Notes, Acts 10:34,35. Rom. 2:7—11.) They ought not therefore to suppose, that any name or form would avail them; or that God would approve of any man, merely because he had been a Jew, or because he was now called a Christian: for he would certainly judge every man's profession and character by his works, appoint hypocrites their portion with unbelievers, and finally condemn every "worker of iniquity." (Notes, Jam. 2:14—26.) Nay, if believers did any evil thing, God would not connive at it, because of their relation to him; but he would surely visit them with sharp rebukes and corrections, and refuse them his consolations, till they had deeply repented of it. It therefore behooved them to "pass the time" of their pilgrimage, in this evil world, "in fear," as well as in "hope:" not doubting of the faithfulness of God to his promises, or giving way to discouraging, enslaving dread of his wrath: but being humbly jealous of themselves, and watchful over their own hearts, fearing lest they should be deceived and come short, lest they should dishonour God, or incur his awful rebukes, and lest they should fall into temptation; and uniting their confidence in the Lord's mercy with reverence of his majesty, holiness, and authority. (Notes, Rom. 11:16—21. Heb. 4:1,2. 12:25—29.)—For the Christian's best state of mind is, a due proportion of humble fear and believing hope, at an equal distance from presumption and despondency. Without hope, a man is like a ship which has no anchor; without fear, he resembles one without ballast. The fearless professor is defenceless; and Satan "takes him captive at his will;" while he who desponds has no heart to avail himself of his advantages, and surrenders at discretion.—The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren to "fear always," as well as to "hope to the end;" especially considering at what a price they had been redeemed.—Once they had lived in a vain unprofitable manner, ordering their whole conversation according to "traditions received from their fathers." The Jews in general had rested in the legal ceremonies, and the "traditions of the elders;" the Gentiles in the absurd fables and idolatrous worship, which had been transmitted to them from their ancestors; and both were at an immense distance from spiritual religion. But they had been redeemed from this state of slavery, and wretched imprisonment, into which they had been sold for their crimes, not only by power exerted, but by a price paid for them, as a satisfaction to the justice of God, that he might act honourably in delivering them. This price had not consisted of "corruptible things," such "as silver and gold," the treasures which men generally most value: but it had been paid with "the blood of Christ," "the Son of the living God," which was indeed most precious, by reason of his divine nature and excellency; so that it was sufficient to render it glorious to the justice and law of God, for the sake of it, to show mercy and give grace to sinners of every nation and description. (Notes, John 1:29.) For this was "the Lamb of God," without the least spot or "blemish, and without spot" of sin, of whose purity and excellency, as well as his sufferings unto death, the innumerable multitude of pascal lambs, and daily burnt-offerings, under the law, had been no more than shadows. He had indeed been "foreordained" to this work, (which none else could have performed,) "from before the foundation of the world," in the eternal counsels of God: and he had been promised as soon as sin had entered: but he had not been personally manifested, "to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself," till these "last times;" in consequence of which he was now openly proclaimed, by the preaching of the gospel, as the Saviour of all men, Jews or Gentiles, who came to him, and to God by him. For the whole benefit was intended for those, who by his grace and through his intercession and atonement, relied on the mercy, truth, and power of God for salvation; being assured that he had raised the crucified Jesus from the dead, and conferred on him the predicted glory, for this very purpose, that sinners, when made sensible of their guilt, and their entire inability to justify

V. 22. The souls of those whom the apostle addressed, like those of all other men, had been polluted with ungodliness, pride, malice, selfishness, and worldly lusts: but they "had purified their souls" from the prevailing influence of these evils, as well as from the guilt of their actual sins, in the method which God had appointed for that purpose. They had been shown by "the word of truth" their need of this purification, and taught in what way it might be effected: and "in obeying the truth," by repentance, faith in Christ, and the use of 'the means of grace;' they were thus cleansed from their "filthiness and idols," and the several faculties of their souls were purified and sanctified, to serve God in righteousness and true holiness. This purification had been effected, "through the Spirit," who first quickened, convinced, and humbled them, and so led them to repent, believe, and obey; and afterwards they had sought further degrees of holiness, in dependence on his gracious and powerful influences, and in compliance with them; so that they indeed were active and earnest in this matter, but He had given them both the will and the power. (Notes, Rom. 8:12,13. Phil. 2:12,13.) One peculiar effect and evidence of this "purity of heart" consisted in "unfeigned love of the brethren." They had thus been led to love the image of Christ in his people, and to esteem them highly, though once they would have despised and hated them: they had learned to love their company, to sympathize in their sorrows, to rejoice in their comforts, to do them good, and to live at peace with them. This they did unfeignedly, by choice and in uprightness, and they evinced it by giving up their own interest or indulgence for their benefit. Their love of each other was in this respect far different from that hollow show of friendship and affection, which prevails in the world; and which is chiefly expressed by insincere professions and unmeaning compliments. (Notes, Rom. 12:9—13. Jam. 2:14—18. 3:17,18. 1 John 3:18—24.) As they had then attained to a measure of this disinterested love; let them see to it, as of the greatest importance, that they loved one another more and more. (Notes, 4:8. Phil. 1:9—11. 1 Thes. 4:9—12.) Using the same means, and depending on the same Spirit, let them seek more entire purity from every selfish, envious, or malevolent affection; that no anger, bitterness, prejudice, or carnal passions might warp, debase, or interrupt their mutual love; and that it might grow more fervent and intense, and be manifested in more self-denying endeavours to promote each other's temporal comfort and spiritual advantages.

V. 23—25. This brotherly love was indeed in some sense natural to them, not as men, but as Christians; as they were all children of one family, and more nearly related than any earthly brethren could be. (Notes, Eph. 2:14—22.) For they were "born again; not of corruptible seed," as all the human race are born of Adam's fallen nature, to sicken and die, and so to return to corruption and dust, in respect of their bodies: whilst the soul, unless regenerate, must sink into misery: nor yet were they merely distinguished from others, as the natural posterity of Abraham, which was only "a corruptible seed:" but they were "born again of an incorruptible seed, even by the word of God" implanted in their hearts by the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 3—5. John 1:10—13. 3:3—8. Jam. 1:16—18.) This, being immutable and eternal truth in itself, "liveth, and abideth for ever," in the effects produced by it on their hearts, according to the promises of God; being the seed of a divine life, and powerfully operating a total change in the judgment, dispositions, and affections of the soul. (Notes, Heb. 4:12,13. 1 John 3:7—10. 5:16—18.) So that all, who were "born again," (however before separated and distinguished,) were thenceforth "brethren" by an enduring and relation; which will flourish, when all other relations shall be disolved, or lost in total enmity. For "all flesh," all that is born of Adam's fallen nature, is as grass; and "all the glory of man," whatever any of the human race ever boasted of, or rejoiced in, was and is but as the "flower of the grass:" whether it be noble or royal birth, genius, wisdom, learning, accomplishments, wealth, magnificence, or splendid actions; or even the glorying of the Jews in being the children of Abraham: for the whole must soon wither and be cut down, and end in the grave and in hell. (Notes, Ps. 103:14—17. Is. 40:6—8. Jam. 1:9—11. 1 John 2:15—17.) But "the word of God abideth for ever:" its truths, promises, and threatenings will be accomplished to eternity; and its effects in the souls of the regenerate will be eternal also. And, as this word had been by the gospel preached to them; they ought to bless God for their privileges; to seek an increasing experience of its efficacy; to value this distinction above all others; and "to love one another with a pure heart fervently," without respect to their Jewish or Gentile extraction, or any external distinctions, of whatever kind. (Notes, Matt. 3:7—10. Phil. 3:1—7.)—The quotation (Is. 40:6,7.) is nearly from the Septuagint, which accords to the Hebrew. 'It is grossly contrary to the truth of the Scriptures to imagine, that they who are thus renewed can be unborn again.' Arbp. Leighton

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. As we, if true Christians, are "strangers" or earth, we should expect contempt and unkindness from the men of this world, and continually prepare for a removal to our eternal home: and we should remember, that we are "scattered" in different countries, cities, and families, as witnesses for God and his truth, to those among whom we live. All the redeemed were "elected according to the foreknowledge of God the Father:" but this cannot be known by them, except "through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience." (Note, 1 Thes. 1:1—4.) But when our simple dependence on the atoning blood of Christ, unites with a holy hatred of all sin, and a disposition to obey all the commandments of God, and to delight in them; we may be sure, that we are the objects of his "everlasting love," and that "grace and peace will be multiplied unto" us, till they shall be perfected in the felicity of heaven. "The lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading," which springs from regeneration, is inseparably connected with faith in a crucified and risen Saviour; it ascribes all salvation to the "abundant mercy of God," and excites the possessor to love and practice holiness. It is peculiar to the real Christian; and it totally differs from the vain confidence of formalists, Pharisees, Antinomians, and enthusiasts of every description. If we thus hope for an undefiled felicity, and habitually prepare for it; we may well rejoice, and exult triumphantly that it is "reserved for us in heaven," and that "we are kept" as in a castle "by the power of God, through faith unto salvation," which is made ready, and will be openly revealed when the mystery of God shall be finished.

V. 6—9. "The lively" and assured "hope of an inheritance in heaven," gives substantial joy to the soul, and to it we must have recourse in all our troubles, for support and animation: yet we cannot but sometimes "be in heaviness," when called to struggle with "manifold temptations," to conflict with inward enemies, to walk in darkness without sensible comfort, and to endure afflictions in body, mind, or circumstances. Even they, who "have the first-fruits of the Spirit," do, on such occasions, "groan, being burdened." (Notes, Rom. 7:22—25. 8:18—23.) And though "the Lord does not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men;" yet his wise love often appoints sharp trials for his people, because he knows them to be necessary in order to "humble and prove them, to show what is in their hearts, and to do them good at the latter end." When this is the case, or when his glory in any way requires it, they will be "in heaviness" for a short season: (Note, 2 Cor. 4:13—18.) but neither their trials, nor the peculiar distressing circumstances connected with them, will be sharper, more numerous, or of longer continuance, than it is needful that they should be, in order to try their precious faith, that it may "be found unto praise, and honour, and glory, at the coming of the Lord Jesus." In the intervals of their temptations and conflicts, when they are composed enough to make observations on their experience, their trials, conflicts, and the event of them, they can find that they really do believe in and love an unseen Saviour; and show that faith and love by cleaving to him, and aiming to obey him, in the midst of their troubles. This causes them to rejoice in his all-sufficiency and grace, in his glory and blessedness, and in admiring his infinite loveliness and loving kindness, with a "joy which is unspeakable," and which forms a sweet antepast of the heavenly felicity; tuning their hearts to the songs of the redeemed, and preparing them for their holy employments. Thus, by the way they receive in part, as an earnest and pledge, "the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls."

The sacred character and invaluable privileges of believers, as called out of darkness into light, to show forth the praises of God, 9, 10. The apostle beseeches them to abstain from fleshly lusts, and by their good conversation to glorify God among the Gentiles, 11, 12. He enforces obedience to magistrates, 13–17, and that of servants to their masters; exhorting them to suffer patiently even for well-doing after the example of Christ, and from love to him, 18–25.

V. 10—16. While we discourse freely on evangelical and experimental subjects, numbers, either ignorantly or maliciously, charge us with holding novel doctrines, and introducing a new religion: but in fact these principles were first published, as soon as "sin entered into the world;" though they have passed, so to speak, through several enlarged editions: but every thing is new to him, who is hitherto unacquainted with it. Concerning these things the ancient "prophets inquired" and searched with great diligence, that they might know something of the grace preparing for later ages; and for four thousand years "the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow," formed the great subject of revelation, in multiplied types, promises, and predictions. At length "the desire of nations" appeared, "fulfilled all righteousness," finished, by his sufferings on the cross, his work on earth, and entered into his glory; then apostles bore testimony to the same important truths, and "the Holy Spirit was sent down from heaven" to authenticate their testimony: while "angels desired to look down into these things," as eclipsing all former displays of the harmonious perfections of their God. And shall not we then search diligently those Scriptures, which contain the joyful and interesting doctrines of salvation? Or shall we neglect the means of appropriating to ourselves its everlasting benefits? Far be this from us! Rather let us throw aside all carnal incumbrances, and use every method of bringing our minds into a proper frame, for attending to this grand concern, and of doing the work of our great Master with alacrity and industry. Let us study to be "sober," in the midst of a giddy, sensual, and intoxicated world; let us "hold fast the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end;" and show ourselves the "obedient children" of God, by avoiding conformity to the world, and by taking care not to "fashion ourselves according to the former lusts in our ignorance;" (Notes, 4:3—5. Rom. 12:1,12.) but especially watching and praying against those sins, to which we were then most prone or accustomed. Thus let us aim to become "holy in all manner of conversation," even "as God who hath called us is holy;" for he sanctifies all whom he saves, and "without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

V. 17—21. The God whom we worship "is no Respecter of persons;" but does now, and will at last, "judge according to every man's work." He will detect many hypocrites, whom his servants never suspected, and some who never suspected themselves: and he will condemn many, as "workers of iniquity," who called him their Father, and Jesus their Lord and Master. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. Luke 13:22—30.) Knowing these things, and aware of the deceitfulness of our hearts, the subtlety of our enemies, and the manifold delusions which are propagated on every side; we should "pass the time of our sojourning" in this perilous world, in humble, watchful, and zealous "fear;" which will best secure us against fatal deceptions, and preserve us from dishonouring God and exposing ourselves to his fatherly corrections. (Notes, Prov. 14:15,16. 28:14. Rom. 11:16—21.) It behooves us also frequently to remember, that all the riches of the world could never have saved one soul from eternal destruction. Why then should we covet such unavailing perishing treasures? (Notes, Ps. 49:6—9. Matt. 16:24—28. P. O. 21—28.)—But how vast are our obligations to the Lord Jesus, the spotless "Lamb of God," whose precious blood was freely shed to ransom our souls, and to obtain eternal salvation for us. May we "by him believe in God, who raised him from the dead and gave him glory, that our faith and hope" may rest on the infinite perfection and love of God, for all things pertaining to our eternal salvation! In this view, how absurd does the conduct of all those appear, who cleave to "the vain conversation delivered to them by tradition from their fathers," and avow a determination never to change the religion, which they have inherited from them! I this principle had been adhered to, "Christ would have died in vain:" for Jews and Gentiles must have agreed in rejecting the gospel, to cleave to the traditions, superstitions, or idolatry of their elders and ancestors: and the case must have continued the same, through all succeeding generations, to the end of the world! So dreadfully absurd and mischievous is this too common notion!

V. 22—25. It is highly important that men should seriously consider, and be deeply convinced, that their souls must be purified from pollution, or they will inevitably perish; that there is a work and duty for them to attend on in this matter; that they can do nothing in it, except by "obeying the truth;" that they cannot "obey the truth" but by the "Holy Spirit," whom God has promised to give to those that ask him; (Note, Luke 11:5—13.) and that "unfeigned love" of true Christians is one proper test and standard of evangelical purity of heart. If we have attained to this infallible evidence, that "the good work" is begun within us, let us see to it, "that we love one another with a pure heart fervently." Thus it will be more and more evident, that we are "born again of incorruptible seed, by the word of God which liveth and abideth for ever." (Notes, 1 John 4:7,8. 5:1—3.) As this needful and most blessed change is wrought by means of the sacred word of divine life, it is of far greater importance to us to search the Scriptures daily; to use every means to become acquainted with them; and to bring others, in our families or congregations, acquainted with them; than to speculate about the manner, in which they are rendered effectual to this end. All other distinctions will soon be lost, and as it were swallowed up, in the difference between the regenerate and the unregenerate; all other glory will wither, and terminate in everlasting shame and disgrace; all other unions will be dissolved and perish. But those who are one in Christ Jesus, and are "beautified with his salvation," will be united in perfect love, glory, and felicity, for ever. As "this word of the gospel," which is the seed of eternal life, is preached to us also; let us see to it, that it dwells in our hearts, and brings forth holy fruit in our lives; and then we shall "not be ashamed or confounded, world without end."

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—3. From the truths, stated in the preceding chapter, the apostle took occasion to exhort his brethren, to "lay aside," as a polluted garment, which they had worn too long, all kinds of "malice, guile, hypocrisies," insincerity in their profession, or flattery and compliment in conversation, with "envyings and all slanders." (Note, Jam. 1:19—21.) This was needful in order that with the simplicity of "new-born infants, they might desire," and relish, the uncorrupted doctrines and precepts of the word of God, as "the new-born babe" craves the nutrimental milk of the breast, and wants no other sustenance: that thus they might grow, by this wholesome food for their souls, in knowledge, faith, hope, love, and every holy affection; and not always be as children; or become dwarfs, who are seldom healthy, comfortable, comely, or useful. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Eph. 4:14—16. Heb. 5:11—14.) Such a conduct might be expected from them, and even from those who had lately been converted; "if so be," or since, "they had tasted that the Lord is gracious."—The apostle here applied to Christ, as the context proves, what the Psalmist had spoken of JEHOVAH. (Note, Ps. 34:8.)—The Lord is merciful and kind, whether men believe it, or not: many have inefficacious notions of his mercy, without any experience or taste of it, and these notions commonly embolden them in rebellion: but regenerate persons believe that he is gracious; they apply to him in that persuasion, and thus they taste and relish his grace, and have an earnest of their future felicity, even "the witness in themselves" of his mercy and truth. (Notes, Ps. 4:6—8. 51:12,13. 63:5—8. Prov. 14:10. 24:13,14. Cant. 1:3,4. 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9,10.)—Malice, &c. (1) The apostles sometimes name some of these evils, and sometimes others of them; but they are all inseparable as one garment, and all comprehended under that one word, "the old man," which the apostle there exhorts to put off. (Eph. 4:22.)—"The word

V. 4—6. The apostle, having been educated a Jew, and writing to Jewish converts, as well as others, retained the typical language of the Old Testament, concerning a temple, a priesthood, and sacrifices. The temple had been the centre of JEHOVAH's worship: there he displayed his glory from the mercy-seat, and dwelt among his people: there he received their worship, and communicated his benefits: there alone God engaged to meet sinners and bless them, and penitent believers approached God to glorify him; for every accepted prayer and service had reference to the worship at the temple. (Notes, Ex. 25:10—22. Lev. 17:3—9. Deut. 12:5—7. 1 Kings 8:28—30.) Thus Christ is the spiritual "Temple, in which God dwells" with men: and believers, as one with him, form a part of the sacred building, and he blesses them; and sinners come to God in Christ, and glorify him. (Notes, John 1:14. 2:14—17.) In allusion to this type, Christ is called "a living Stone," as elsewhere "living Bread." The metaphor showed his power, stability, and permanent sufficiency, in his Person and mediation, to sustain the whole weight of the glory of God, and the salvation of his people, which was to be laid upon him: and the epithet "living," while it showed that the expression was figurative, pointed out the quickening efficacy of his grace on the souls of those who had been dead in sin, and intimated that he "ever liveth to make intercession" for his people, and to maintain their cause. This Stone was "disallowed of men," both Jews and Gentiles, so long as they continued unregenerate; because men are naturally ignorant, self-wise, self-righteous, carnal, and at enmity with God; so that they cannot receive his humbling holy doctrines and salvation: but it was "chosen of God," to be the Support, Cement, and Ornament of the whole spiritual building; and was most "precious" in itself, and perfectly fitted for that purpose. (Notes, Matt. 16:18. 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) All therefore, who are born again, and thus enlightened, humbled, made in a measure spiritual, and taught to seek reconciliation unto God, "come to Christ," to build their hopes and souls on him whom men despised; that they may be made a part of this holy and living Temple; continually applying to him, and to the Father through him, for his salvation, and the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit. Thus they "as living stones," by life derived from Christ, became meet to be built up as a part of this spiritual house, consecrated to God and his holy habitation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:16,17. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22.)—But, to show more fully the import of this figurative language, it was proper that the subject should be illustrated by another metaphor: for, by thus coming to Christ, they were washed, anointed, arrayed, and consecrated, as a "holy priesthood," to draw near and minister unto God at his temple. (Notes, Ex. 29: Lev. 8:6—14. Rev. 1:4—6. 5:8—10.) They did not indeed presume to offer atoning sacrifices; but they were consecrated to offer spiritual sacrifices, even prayers, supplications, praises, thanksgivings, good works, and liberal contributions to the poor, especially their indigent brethren; and even their very bodies, as devoted to the service of God. (Notes, Rom. 12:1. Phil. 2:14—18. 4:14—20. Col. 3:16,17. Heb. 13:15,16.) These sacrifices, though defective and defiled, and offered by sinners, would yet be "acceptable to God," because honourable to him, when presented through Jesus Christ, and by faith in his atoning sacrifice and his intercession, as their High-Priest within the heavenly sanctuary. The whole of this accorded to a remarkable prophecy, the explanation of which has already been given. (Note, Is. 28:16.)—The quotation varies in some respects from the Septuagint, but gives the general meaning of both that and the Hebrew. (Notes, Rom. 9:30—33.)

V. 7, 8. Unto those "who believed," Christ was precious, the Foundation of all their hopes, their chief Glory, and most valuable treasure: for they saw such excellency in him, experienced such comfort from him, and so entirely depended on him for salvation: that they were prepared to renounce every thing, even life itself, rather than come short of an interest in him. Or, "to them there was honour," as opposed to the shame before mentioned. (6)—But, on the other hand, those who continued disobedient, (among whom were the Jewish rulers, scribes, and priests, the supposed builders of the temple,) constituted an awful accomplishment of another scripture. (Notes, Ps. 118:19—24. Matt. 21:40—44.) Notwithstanding their proud and obstinate rejection of Christ, and their opposition to him, he was made "the Head of the Corner," but they stumbled and were broken on Him as "a Rock of offence," who was to believers a Refuge and a "Rock of salvation." This was the effect of their unbelief, and disobedience to the promised Messiah; to which they had been appointed in the righteous judgment of God, who purposed to leave them to their prejudice, pride, and enmity and to glorify himself in their punishment, as it was evident by the prophecies fulfilled in that event. (Notes, Is. 6:9,10 8:12—15. Rom. 11:7—15.).

V. 9, 10. "A chosen generation," referring to the choice of Abraham and his posterity: "a royal priesthood;" referring to the covenants with Aaron as to the priesthood, and with David as to the kingdom; and "a holy nation, a peculiar people," referring to the national covenant with Israel, at the giving of the law. (Ex. 19:6. Sept.)—To explain all this, as some do, with great labour and learning, to mean that nominal Christians are, exactly in the same sense, "a chosen generation, &c." as Israel was of old; is a most unreasonable confusion of the typical prophecies contained in the Old Testament, with the accomplishment of them in the "true Israel," or the whole body of true believers, as addressed in the New Testament: and to admit it would subvert the whole system of interpretation, adopted throughout this work; and which, on mature reflection, even on the objections of opponents, the author is daily more and more assured is the only true one. (Notes, Rom. 9:6—18. 11:1—6. Gal. 3:6—14,26—29. 4:21—31. Heb. 12:18—21.) He would not indeed notice these interpretations; but from a fear lest it should be thought, that he had not duly considered what men, eminent for learning, had said against that exposition which he decidedly adheres to.—Israel, as typically "a chosen generation;" was cast off from being the peculiar people of God: but Christians, as the spiritual seed of Abraham, and as born again in consequence of their election in Christ, and "accounted to him for a generation," are indeed "a chosen generation." (Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 53:9. 10. Eph. 1:3—12.) A small company of Israel, compared with the whole nation, officiated as priests, and they were not of the same tribe to which the kingdom was allotted: but in Christ the kingly and priestly offices are united; (Notes, Zech. 6:12,13. Heb. 7:) and through him believers become "a royal priesthood," both "kings and priests," being every way dignified and made honourable, called to exercise a spiritual dominion over those passions to which others are enslaved, and to obtain victories over Satan, the world, and sin; and appointed heirs of the kingdom of heaven. They also constituted "a holy nation," incorporated under the government of Christ, subject to his holy laws, sanctified by his Spirit, conformed to his image, and safe under his protection; and "a peculiar people," purchased with the blood of Christ, redeemed from worse than Egyptian bondage, favoured with peculiar privileges, and formed to a peculiar character and conduct. (Note, Tit. 2:14.)—In all these respects Christians are appointed to show forth the praises of the Lord, by their spiritual worship, their open profession of his gospel, their holy conversation, and exemplary conduct. To this, therefore, the apostle earnestly exhorted his brethren. The Lord had called many of them out of the total darkness of pagan idolatry; and the rest from the comparative darkness of the Mosaic dispensation and Jewish formality, into the clear light of the gospel, to behold the "marvellous" displays thus given of the divine glory, and to partake of his astonishing love to sinners. This he had done, in order that they might be his witnesses and worshippers, to render him the glory due to his name; and to "show forth his praises," or to declare his virtues, or energies, even the efficacy of his grace, in their holy tempers and actions. They had formerly been a people of no name, or excellency; but they were now become "the people of God;" and had "obtained that mercy" for the pardon of their sins, and the salvation of their souls, to which they once were strangers. The prophecy, thus referred to, being quoted by St. Paul, as expressly predicting the calling of the Gentiles, evidently shows that the Jewish converts were not here exclusively addressed. (Notes, Hos. 1:8—10. 2:21—23. Rom. 9:24—29.)

V. 11. The apostle therefore exhorted his "dearly beloved" brethren, who were so highly honoured and peculiarly favoured, to consider themselves "as strangers and pilgrims," who were journeying through a distant land to their heavenly inheritance; (Notes, 1:1,2,17—21. Heb. 11:13—16.) and to "abstain from fleshly lusts," and not allow themselves to hanker after any unlawful, inexpedient, or inordinate animal pleasures, much less to indulge in them; but to keep at a distance from all sensuality, and to bridle and restrain all their appetites, and inure them to subjection: as well as to avoid all other carnal desires after things forbidden, or any earthly object. For such "lusts warred against the soul," to the destruction of immense multitudes: nay, they warred against the souls of Christians; and by their strivings against the spirit, or the regenerate part, and their temporary prevalence in their affections and conduct, often greatly wounded and weakened them.—Covetousness pride, envy, and other aspiring and malignant passions, as much militate against the salvation of men's souls, and oppose the believer's growth in grace, as sensual propensities can do; "they war against the soul;" and are numbered by the apostle Paul among "the works of the flesh." (Note, Gal. 5:19—21.) It cannot therefore be proper to explain the words of St. Peter restrictively of the animal appetites, as warring against the rational powers of the soul. The whole "natural man" is depraved, the seat of sin is in the soul, and the body is only "the instrument of unrighteousness." (Notes, Gen. 6:5. 8:20—22. Jer. 17:9,10. Matt. 15:15—20. Mark 7:22. Rom. 6:12,13,16—19.) And, in the regenerate, the conflict is not between the body and the soul; but between the new and the old nature, called "the flesh and the spirit:" (Notes, Rom. 7:15—25. Gal. 5:16—18.) "Warring against the soul" relates to the destructive tendency of fleshly lusts, the indulgence of which, in any way, is hostile to the soul, and wars against its salvation, or its peace, purity, and vigour.

V. 12. It was incumbent on Christians to maintain an honourable and becoming conversation, in all respects, among their Gentile neighbours: that whereas these, through enmity against God and true religion, and ignorant prejudices, were led to invent and propagate slanders concerning them, as evildoers, or malefactors guilty of crimes injurious to society, because they would not join with them in the established idolatry; Christians might silence their calumnies, and soften their prejudices, by their evident and abundant "good works." Thus their example, in the presence of their enemies, would concur with the preaching of the gospel, in promoting the conversion of the Gentiles; and "in the day of their visitation," when the Lord should please to call them also by his grace, to glorify his name, the holy lives of his people would be owned as the means of that happy change. V. 13—17. (Notes, Rom. 13:1—7. Tit. 3:1,2.). The words rendered "every ordinance of man," may signify every human constitution or form of government. God has appointed magistracy as his ordinance, for the peace and good order of society; but the peculiar form of government is left to human prudence under the direction of Providence. So that Christians are required to submit to that government, which established in the countries where they severally reside, without attempting any alteration, except in a peaceable and legal manner, according to their rank in the community. The apostle wrote when Nero was the Roman emperor; but he was led to use the more general name of "king," as his epistle was intended for the use of future ages and every country. This savage tyrant, who was at length put to death as the enemy of mankind, but not till he had slain multitudes of Christians by his persecuting cruelty, and among the rest the apostles Peter and Paul, as it is generally supposed, was the "supreme," whom Christians must submit to and honour! And the governors of provinces, deputed by him and the Roman senate, together with other subordinate magistrates, must also be obeyed. The intention of civil government is "to punish evildoers;" and to protect and "honour those who do well:" and, in general, the administration, even at that time, would be productive of immense good, compared with lawless anarchy; though in very many things the end of government was doubtless counteracted; for which the rulers would be accountable to the Judge of the world. In this way the duty of kings and rulers also was pointed out to them. But in respect of Christians, it was expressly "the will of God," that, by their good behaviour, "in all godliness and honesty," as peaceable subjects, notwithstanding the oppressions which they suffered, they might "put to silence the ignorant" slanders "of foolish" and wicked men, who reviled them as seditious persons and enemies to the state, because they would worship "the one living and true God" alone, and not join in any idolatry. They ought indeed to consider themselves "as free" from the ceremonial law, from condemnation, from Satan's yoke, and from human impositions in respect of the worship of God; yet they must by no means use their liberty to veil "maliciousness," to cover any sinister and selfish designs, or to find a pretence for gratifying revenge on those who had injured them: but in all things to act "as the servants of God," in willing obedience to his commandments, which formed the most perfect liberty which could be enjoyed. (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:17—24. Gal. 5:13—15. 1 Tim. 6:1—5.) Let them therefore, in obedience to God and for his glory, show respect and honour to all men, according to their rank and authority in society, and not scruple the customary tokens of subjection in things lawful: let them at the same time reserve their especial love for the brotherhood, or their fellow-Christians; and, whilst they feared, worshipped, and reverenced God supremely, let them "honour the king," as far as it consisted with their other duty. (Note, Matt. 22:15—22.)—It is almost impossible, that there can be a worse supreme governor, than he who ruled the vast Roman empire, when this was written by divine inspiration.—The comprehensive brevity of the closing verse, has been greatly and justly admired by competent judges.

V. 18—25. (Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Col. 3:22—25. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. Tit. 2:9,10.) The apostle Peter exhorted servants to obedience, even in stronger language, than his beloved brother Paul had done. These were generally slaves, and many of them to heathen masters, who used them very cruelly. The word here used, signifies domestics, who being more constantly under the eye of their masters, than slaves employed in cultivating the land, are supposed to have suffered more from their violent passions. Yet the apostle directed them to be "subject to their masters with all fear;" with a respectful regard to them, as placed over them by Providence, and with a fear of offending or dishonouring God. This conduct should be observed, not only to such masters as were "good and humane," and who would be pleased on reasonable terms, and mild even when offended; "but also to the froward" and morose, who would be angry without cause, and use severity when displeased. For it would be grace, or the effect and evidence of grace, "acceptable to God" and worthy of man's commendation, if, from a conscientious regard to the authority and will of God, they patiently and meekly endured such treatment, as was grievous to be borne; when not having been faulty they were unjustly punished. Indeed, "what glory," or honourable distinction, could it be, for professed Christians to be patient, when they were beaten, or scourged for their faults, seeing many of the Gentile slaves submitted quietly in this case? But if they behaved well, and were beaten by their proud and passionate heathen masters; and yet bore it, without peevish complaints or purposes of revenge, still persevering in meek endeavours to do their duty; this indeed would "be acceptable with God," and rewarded by him as a distinguishing effect of his grace. (Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Luke 6:27—36.) For Christians were especially "called" thus to do good to all men, and to endure ill usage from them; and still to proceed with alacrity in doing well, amidst ingratitude, revilings, and injuries, without being wearied out by any kind or degree of evil done to them: "because Christ," when he suffered in their stead, "left them," in this and in all other respects, "an example, that they should follow his steps;" that by contemplating the same Object, to which they looked for pardon and righteousness, they might learn how to act in the most trying circumstances. (Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) He indeed had "done no sin" in any degree; and perfect wisdom, love, and holiness were displayed in all his works; nor was there any guile in his words: so that the contempt, malice, and cruelty, with which he met, were base returns for the greatest kindnesses, and the most unworthy treatment of consummate excellency. Yet "when he was reviled," as if guilty of the most atrocious crimes, he did not retort the reproachful language, though most justly deserved by his enemies: and even "when he suffered" all kinds of indignities and tortures, till they terminated in his death on the cross, he did not so much as "threaten" his crucifiers, though all power was vested in him. On the contrary he prayed for them, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" and thus he "committed himself to him who judged righteously," and left him to justify his character, plead his cause, and punish his enemies. This example Christians were peculiarly bound to consider and imitate; because the Lord Jesus, when he thus suffered, acted as their holy and divine Surety; and, pitying their misery, when they deserved and were exposed to the wrath of God, he voluntarily "bare" the guilt and punishment of "their sins," as imputed to him, and expiated them by his death "on the tree," or cross; in order that through his grace, and the encouragements of his gospel, they might become "dead to sin," and separated from it, and so "live unto righteousness," as the obedient servants of God. (Notes, 3:17,18. Is. 53:7—12. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Gal. 3:8—14.) Thus, through the ignominious stripes, which he (holy and glorious as he was) willingly endured for them, and by the scars of those wounds, which he received for their sakes, the diseases of their souls were healed; which were far worse than the livid marks left on their bodies, from the cruel scourgings inflicted on them, in which they were conformed to their divine Lord. (Notes, Is. 53:4—6. Matt. 27:26—31.) The consideration of his scourgings, and livid scars, was suited in the most affecting manner to reconcile the poor slaves, while suffering under the cruel usage of their masters, to their hard lot; when their Redeemer, the holy Jesus, the Lord of glory, had thus suffered for their salvation. These things indeed related to all Christians, though especially addressed to slaves; for all without exception had been "as sheep going astray," and must have fallen a prey to "the roaring lion which sought to devour" their souls; (Note, 5:8,9.) but they had been sought out by, and "brought back," or converted to, the good Shepherd, who laid down his life for the sheep. (Notes, Zech. 13:7. John 10:10—18.) Thus they were safely lodged in his fold under his care, and made partakers of his love, who, as the Bishop, or Overseer of their souls, watched over them, and was become their omniscient, omnipotent, and most holy Protector. (Notes, Ps. 119:176. Is. 53:4—6. Luke 15:1—7.)—Some expositors call the things, which the apostle here speaks, concerning Christ, a digression from his subject, and the effect of the fulness of his heart: but I apprehend that the Holy Spirit led him thus to write, that ministers and theologians might learn from his example, to inculcate practical matters from evangelical principles, and thus set on them the special stamp of Christianity, and evidently distinguish them from heathen morality. (Notes, Tit. 2:1,2,9,10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The apostles, with one consent, declare the necessity of "laying aside all malice, guile, hypocrisies, envies, and slanders," in order to "receive with meekness" the instructions of Christ. We need not then wonder, that there are so many hearers of the word wholly unfruitful; and that others are so little edified: when we observe how much these apostolical injunctions are neglected. But let those, who are as "new-born infants" in the family of God, but have "tasted that the Lord is gracious," avoid all such as would mislead them into controversies, which are commonly conducted with malice, envy, deceit, and detraction; and let them beware of "all hypocrisy:" that so the health of their souls may be preserved, a vitiated appetite prevented, and a relish of the holy word of God increased. They ought also to attend primarily to the more simple and easy parts of divine truth, which is the proper milk for young converts: that so, "growing by it to maturity of judgment, experience, and grace, they may at length be able to digest the more difficult doctrines; which are suitable food for those who are of full age, and which will never be given to new-born babes, by those who know how "rightly to divide the word of truth." (Notes, 2 Tim. 2: 14—18. Heb. 5:11—14.)—But let no man rest in unexperienced notions: for even "babes in Christ taste that he is gracious;" and their experience of his love and mercy draws them to seek him, in all their subsequent distresses, fears, wants, and temptations, and to rest on him as "the Foundation" of all their hopes. Thus they are daily "coming to him," and are builded on him, "as living stones to be a spiritual house;" and consecrated by him as "a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God" through him: for true religion consists of doctrine, experience, and practice; and he who attempts to separate these, takes the ready way of destroying the whole.—As the Lord has laid "this chief Corner-stone, elect, precious," to be the Foundation of his living temple; those who are taught to come to him, and rest their hopes on him, will surely be safe and happy: for the whole Scripture declares, that "he who believeth on him shall never be ashamed." But whilst our Emmanuel, and his salvation, are glorious in the eyes and "precious" to the hearts of all the regenerate, who deem it their chief honour to belong to him and serve him; men in general, continuing proud, carnal, and alienated from God, can see no comeliness or glory in them. (Notes, Is. 53:2,3. John 1:14. 15:22—25.) He is indeed made "the Headstone of the corner;" but modern builders in general make no of the corner;" but modern builders in general make no account of him: and many carry on their work, either in open opposition to him, or in manifest neglect of him. Thus they "stumble at the word, being disobedient," and will perish more dreadfully than if he had never come to be the Saviour of sinners; "whereunto also they were appointed."—But let us inquire, whether we have the obedient faith of those to whom "Christ is precious:" for many profess his truths, who stumble at his precepts; and so in another way he becomes to them "a Rock of offence," and an occasion of deeper condemnation.

V. 9—17. Happy are they, of whom it may truly be said, "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people!" If we aspire at these distinctions, let us be "followers of God as dear children;" let us abound in "spiritual sacrifices," and be careful to act up to the dignity and sanctity of our royal and priestly character, in all the concerns of life: let us obey the holy laws of Christ our King, and seek his honour, in connexion with the peace and prosperity of our fellow-subjects; and let us be careful to appear as "a peculiar people, zealous of good works," (Note, Tit. 2:14.) whose great business it is, "to show forth the praises of God, who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light." Thus we shall best evince that these blessings belong to us, and shall make the most suitable returns for them. Most of us well know and remember, that once we "were not a people" devoted to the Lord, nor had we sought and "obtained mercy" from him: how vast then are our obligations to him, who has made us his people, and shown mercy to us! It becomes us therefore "as strangers and pilgrims to abstain from" all kinds of fleshly lusts, which continually "war against the souls" of men: nor can a believer, in any instance or degree indulge them, without being wounded, weakened, defiled, and injured.—But we should consider, not only our own comfort and advantages: the honour of the gospel, and the conversion of our neighbours, likewise demand our attention. Let us then study to "have our conversation honest" and honourable amidst our enemies and slanderers; that, whereas they "revile us as evildoers," our evident "good works" may refute their slanders, and be the means, if the Lord please, of bringing them also to believe in him, and to glorify his name. (Note, 3:1—7.) For if we, who "had not obtained mercy have at length obtained mercy;" why may not they, who still remain ignorant and prejudiced, be made partakers of the same salvation?—With this intent, and from other evangelical motives, we should "submit to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake;" obeying the king, and all placed in authority under him; praying for them, that they may have wisdom and grace to be faithful to their important trust, (Notes, 1 Tim. 2:1—4.) and for the preservation of our most excellent constitution; and endeavouring, as "the quiet in the land," by "well-doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men: as free," with that liberty which the Son of God bestows through the Holy Spirit; (Notes, John 8:30—36. Rom. 6:16—23.) but remembering that we are "the servants of God," and must in no degree use our liberty to cloak any malicious or ambitious designs. By thus honouring all men, loving our brethren, fearing God, and honouring the king; we shall best adorn the gospel, and most experience its comfort.

V. 18—25. The view given by the apostle of the behaviour of many masters to their unoffending slaves, may serve to convince us, how incompatible slavery is with the "love of our neighbours," and animate us to protest, in all proper ways, against so grievous an oppression of our fellow-creatures: yet Christianity, among its other unparalleled excellencies, teaches men to behave honourably, and live comfortably, even in these circumstances of degradation and suffering. But if slaves, when thus unjustly and cruelly used, were directed to submit to their masters and respect them; how inexcusable are those hired servants, who, professing the gospel, do not "obey good and gentle masters!" who can endure no degree of "frowardness" in others, through the indulgence of it in themselves; and who will not bear a reproof, when they are most evidently culpable! Indeed, this alone would be no evidence of grace or acceptable obedience, though it would be far better than "answering again:" but when, in any situation, "we do well, and" then "suffer" rebuke or ill-usage "patiently, from conscience towards God," we manifest the reality of our grace, ensure a bounteous recompense, and have the honour of resembling our blessed Lord: and servants to unconverted masters, who without cause injure and revile them, should rejoice in showing whose followers they are. Indeed, we cannot go through with our duty, as Christians in any station, if we do not persevere in endeavouring to "overcome evil with good," copying the conduct of him who "suffered for us, and left us an example that we should follow his steps." Our sufferings and reproaches can neither be so unmerited nor so great as his were; who "when he was reviled, reviled not again;" who suffered without threatening, and "committed himself to him that judgeth righteously." As therefore "he, his own self, bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we being dead to sin might live unto righteousness," and that "by his stripes our souls might be healed;" and as we all "were as sheep going astray," till divine grace brought us back to "the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls;" let us learn to copy his example, when reviled and abused; as well as to rely on his merits, and keep close under his gracious protection and guidance to the end of our pilgrimage.

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—4. (Note, Eph. 5:22—33.) The apostle next gave directions, concerning the duties of wives and husbands, as a matter of great importance to the credit and success of the gospel. In general, wives were commanded to be "subject to their own husbands:" and even those who were married to Gentiles, or other unbelievers, whether they had been converted since their marriage, or had sinfully brought themselves into so trying a situation, ought to obey this commandment in all things lawful. (Notes, Gen. 3:16. 1 Cor. 7:10—14. 11:2—16.) This must be attended to in a conscientious manner: not only in order to lighten their own trial, and to "adorn the gospel," but with an especial aim at the conversion of their husbands; (Note, 1 Cor. 7:15,16.) which was not so much to be expected from a disputatious attempt to teach them the gospel, as from the silent persuasive eloquence of a becoming deportment. Thus the wives might hope to win upon those, who "did not obey the word," but treated it with contempt or neglect; as the constant, obliging, amiable conduct, and prudent discourse of such near relatives would tend to soften their prejudices, and conciliate their affections; and so induce them to pay attention to the preaching of the gospel. For it would have a considerable tendency to their conviction, habitually to witness and experience the excellent effects of Christianity, in the chaste, modest, and faithful conduct of their wives; as united with respectful fear of disobliging or grieving them, and reverential regard to the authority and commands of God. In this endeavour, they must not deem outward things, such as "plaiting the hair, wearing" golden rings and bracelets, or "putting on" elegant or becoming garments, to be "their adorning," in any degree: but they must value and seek for an inward beauty, residing in the heart, as "a hidden man," visible in its essence only unto God, consisting of a renewal and sanctification of the whole soul to the divine image, through "the incorruptible seed of the word," made effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit: for this alone would continue for ever, without decaying, or being tarnished. (Note, 1 Tim. 2:9,10.) This inward beauty and ornament of a sanctified heart would especially be manifested by "a meek and quiet spirit," which was "in the sight of God" very valuable; and he would certainly honour it, though men might undervalue it. Indeed, it would be their best ornament in the sight of their husbands, and do far more to fix their affections and excite their esteem; than the studied decorations of becoming or fashionable apparel, attended by a froward and contentious temper. (Notes, Ps. 25:8,9. 37:10,11. 149:4. Is. 61:1—3. Matt. 5:5. Luke 4:16—19.)—Outward ornaments, according to every one's rank in life, are not absolutely prohibited by these Scriptures, as it has been generally observed: but the frivolous affectation and vanity, which constitute the love of finery; the time, attention, and expense, wasted by those, who are attached to such decorations; and the proportionable neglect of the "inward adorning," which is uniformly connected with it, sufficiently prove, that the more moderate and indifferent about these embellishments Christians are, from proper principles, and without preciseness and censoriousness, the more respectable and amiable they must appear in the eyes of all competent judges.—[c] The works of charity, performed to the distressed, with the money

4 But let it be [i]the hidden man of the heart, in that [j]which is not corruptible, even the ornament of [k]a meek and [l]quiet spirit, [m]which is in the sight of God of great price.

5 For after this manner in the old time, [n]the holy women also, [o]who trusted in God, [p]adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands:

9 Not [c]rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing: but contrariwise, blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto [d]called, [e]that ye should inherit a blessing.

10 For [f]he that will [g]love life, and [h]see good days, let him [i]refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they [k]speak no guile:

11 Let him [l]eschew evil, and [m]do good: let him [n]seek peace, and ensue it.

12 For [o]the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and [p]his ears are open unto their prayer: [q]but the face of the Lord is [r]against them that do evil.

V. 5, 6. The internal ornaments, which the apostle recommended, had been of repute in the church, from the most remote antiquity; for thus "holy women of old time, who trusted in" the promises of "God," and were partakers in his salvation, had "adorned themselves;" not counting either their personal beauty, or their costly garments, "their adorning;" but in "the meekness of wisdom" they willingly obeyed God, by being in subjection to their own husbands. Thus Sarah, the honoured mother of the nation of Israel, had "obeyed Abraham:" and, in token of her respect for his person, and the authority which God had vested in him, she was used to "call him, lord."—It is remarkable, that in the instance, where this is recorded, Sarah expressed such unbelief respecting the promise of God, that she was sharply rebuked for it; yet that is here passed over, and the only good word which she spoke on this occasion, is mentioned to her commendation. (Note, Gen. 18:9—12.) This shows how readily the Lord pardons the sins, and how graciously he accepts the poor services of the upright.—Many of the Christian women, whom Peter addressed, were descended from Abraham and Sarah; and the others would be accounted as her daughters, heirs of her faith, and imitators of her example, so long as they behaved well in their relative duties, and as it became the disciples of Christ: and were not so afraid of the anger of their husbands, or of others, as to deny him, or act contrary to his commandments, through unbelief and consternation of spirit. For this would be rather an imitation of Sarah, when, through surprise, she denied that she laughed; than of her faith and holiness, or her becoming subjection to her husband.

Amazement. (6) Πτοησιν. Here only. From πτεσομαι, to be in consternation. Luke 21:9. 24:37.—Ex. 19:16. Josh. 7:5. Sept.

V. 7. On the other hand, the apostle exhorted "husbands," professing the gospel, to "dwell with" their wives, in a rational and intelligent manner, which might evince the propriety of the authority being conferred on them. They ought to behave towards them, as became those who had the knowledge of God and of true religion; who understood the ends for which marriage was appointed, and the manner in which pious persons ought to behave in that holy estate: and this would keep them from every thing unbecoming, unkind, unfaithful, or injurious to their temporal comfort, or spiritual improvement. As their wives were of the same nature, and conjoined in the most endeared and indissoluble union, which blended all their interests with those of their husbands: so the consideration of their inferiority in this relation, and the comparative weakness of their sex, which rendered them incapable of so great hardship and fatigue as men could endure; together with their manifold infirmities, as connected with child-bearing, should induce their husbands to treat them with the greater respect, and more tender regard; instead of exciting them to tyrannize over them. They ought therefore to show a peculiar esteem and affection for them; to take much satisfaction in their company; to honour them before servants and strangers; to support their credit in the family; to make a becoming provision for their wants, to lay no unreasonable injunctions upon them; and to show a great concern in every thing relative to their health, comfort, and reputation. And, if they would be thought superior in knowledge or wisdom, they ought to show it, by not taking offence at trifles, and by giving up their own humours and inclinations, to oblige their wives, and for their welfare. These things should be attended to, from the consideration that they were "fellow-heirs of the grace of life," or of the free favour and gift of God, which is eternal life: and therefore, as companions in their pilgrimage, they ought to do all, which they possibly could, to solace, counsel, and assist each other by the way. They should also more attentively guard against all disagreements and domestic uneasiness; that nothing might occur to indispose them for prayer, in secret, and in the family, but especially with each other. This, being essential to the Christian's prosperity, was a matter of so great importance, that all things, in his whole conduct, ought to be regulated with reference to it.—Perhaps it might also be intimated, that in case a Christian had an unconverted wife, he ought to study by kind behaviour to conciliate her mind; that so she might do nothing to interrupt the social worship of the family, but might be induced amicably to join in it.

V. 8—12. (Notes, 2:13—25. Rom. 12:9—21. 1 Cor. 1:4 —9. 13:4—7. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 2:1—4.) These exhortations entirely coincide with those which have been considered in St. Paul's epistles.—As the conclusion and substance of all his admonitions, the apostle exhorted Christians to be "of one mind" and judgment, as far as possible, in the great concerns of religion: to sympathize with each other in their personal trials and sorrows, and to rejoice in each other's comforts; to bear a brotherly affection to all their fellow-Christians; to compassionate the miseries, and relieve the wants, of their unbelieving neighbours; to be friendly, obliging, affable, accessible, and condescending to inferiors, in their whole conduct; endeavouring to conciliate the affections of all men, by every kind of civility and concession, as far as could consist with their other duties: and by no means retaliating injuries, or retorting revilings; but, on the contrary, blessing, and praying for, their contumelious and malicious enemies, and speaking kindly to them. (Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Luke 6:27—36. 1 Thes. 5:12—15.) In doing this, they might be encouraged and influenced, by the consideration, that God had graciously "called them," from being his enemies, and exposed to the awful curse of his law, by the grace of his gospel, "to inherit a blessing," in time and to eternity. (Note, Gal. 3:6—14.) They ought, therefore, to copy his love, who had "overcome evil with good" in his dealings with them: and to pity the misery and blindness, rather than resent the injuries of their enemies, who could not possibly deprive them of their felicity. This accorded to the advice given to young persons by the Psalmist. (Notes, P 34...—14.)

(Note, Heb. 12:14.) For the omniscient and omnipresent God "watched over the righteous," and would take care of them; (Notes, 2 Chr. 16:7—10. Ps. 103: 15—18.) and he was ever ready to hear and answer their prayers: but he "set himself," as a frowning Judge, and an omnipotent Adversary, against all impenitent sinners.—He that will love. (10) The quotation is from the Septuagint, which well translates the Hebrew, except as the apostle uses the third person, instead of the second.

V. 13—16. The apostle, with great animation, next demanded, who could or would harm them, if they copied the example of him, who is essential and perfect goodness, and were imitators of him, who did good to others, as an imitator of Christ. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:1.) In this case none could do them real harm; and this inoffensive, upright, and benevolent conduct would generally, in time, disarm the enmity of their neighbours. But sometimes it would not be so; as Satan would attempt to instigate the natural enmity of men's hearts against the gospel, and, by connecting it with the ambition, jealousy, resentment, political interest, or bigotry of rulers, to persecute the church. If therefore they should be called to "suffer for righteousness' sake," they ought to deem this a peculiar honour and happiness. (Notes, 4:12—16. Matt. 5: 10—12. Luke 6:21—23.) Nor ought they to be dismayed at the rage, menaces, decrees, and power of their persecutors, which were "their terror;" but which could at most only "kill the body," and could not so much as touch that without the permission of God. (Notes, Matt. 10:24—31.) They ought not therefore to be so troubled about these matters, as by confusion of mind to be unfit for their duty, or in danger of listening to temptations and denying Christ; as the apostle himself had done on one occasion. (Note, Matt. 26:69—75.) To avoid this, they ought to "sanctify the LORD God in their hearts," maintaining honourable thoughts of his perfections, reverencing his name, fearing nothing so much as his displeasure, and trusting their souls, lives, liberty, possessions, reputations, and families in his hands, as in a Sanctuary, and a strong Tower. (Note, Is. 8:11—15.)—Instead therefore of renouncing or concealing their religion; they were exhorted to be, at all times, ready and prepared "to give an answer," to defend the cause of truth, and to show its excellency and authority to "every man who asked a reason of the hope that was in them;" whether he were a magistrate, or a private person, and whatever motives induced him to the inquiry. As Christians, they hoped in God through Christ for eternal life; and in this confidence they renounced present advantages, and exposed themselves to most grievous sufferings. What therefore was the ground and "reason of their hope?" This question they should be prepared to answer, by showing the conclusive evidences which demonstrated that Christianity was from God; its grand design; the need men have of forgiveness and sanctification; the nature of redemption by the blood of Christ, and of the new creation of the Spirit unto obedience; and the promises, security, and seal of the new covenant. Thus they might evince from the authenticated word of God, and their own experience of its effects, and the influence which it had on their conduct, that they hoped for happiness on reasonable grounds: and acted wisely in renouncing, venturing, and suffering all things for the sake of it.—But cogent arguments alone would not suffice in this testimony: they must also speak "with meekness," or modesty, humility, calmness, and love; "and fear," or a reverence for God and heavenly things, and a cautious guard over their own spirits, lest their mismanagement should disgrace the cause of the truth. And they must also "have a good conscience," purged from the discouragement of guilt by the blood of Christ, that they might be satisfied as to the event; and as an enlightened monitor directing them in all holy conduct: (Notes, Acts 24:10—21. 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Cor. 1:12—14. Heb. 9:11—14. 13:18,19.) that so, their persecutors, who treated them as malefactors, might be ashamed of thus falsely accusing and violently opposing men, whose habitual deportment, as the disciples of Christ, was undeniably excellent.—Sanctify, &c. (15) Nearly from the LXX, which agrees with the Hebrew. (Is. 8:12,13.)

V. 17, 18. Nature would be most ready to repine or rage at undeserved sufferings: (Note, 2:18—25.) yet, in fact, it God were pleased so to appoint, it was far more desirable, honourable, comfortable, and profitable, to "suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing;" as all the guilt would in this case belong to the persecutors, and all the advantage would wholly accrue to the sufferers. (Notes, 4:12—16. 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) Thus likewise they would be conformed to Christ, who "once suffered;" being falsely accused of men as an evil-doer, and treated by them with all possible cruelty and insult: but he, "the just one," being perfectly righteous, was made a Sacrifice "for sin, instead of the unrighteous;" having no sin of his own, and yet "suffering for sin," it was evident he suffered for the sins of others. (Notes, Is. 53:4—12. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Gal. 3:6—14. 1 John 2:1,2.) This he submitted to, from gratuitous and unspeakable love; that he might bring rebels, enemies, and condemned sinners "unto God," as pardoned, reconciled, sanctified, and made friends and children; that they might be happy for ever in his favour; and that he might be glorified in their salvation, and by their worship and services. For "the righteous" Saviour having been thus "put to death in the flesh," in respect of his human nature, on the charge of blasphemy; was speedily "quickened," or raised from the dead, by the power of the Holy Spirit, and thus declared to be the Son of God, as he had avowed that he was.—The resurrection of Christ is sometimes ascribed to God or the Father, sometimes to Christ himself, and sometimes to the Holy Spirit. This is very easy and natural, if Father, Son, and Spirit are one God: but how can it be explained on any other principle?—The case is the same in many other things. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. It need not be thought wonderful, that so many refused to believe in the risen and glorified Saviour, through the preaching of his apostles, aided by the Holy Spirit; as the case had been the same of old. For Christ, as God, and with reference to his future incarnation, had gone, by his Spirit, (Note, 1:10—13.) inspiring his servant Noah, to denounce the approaching deluge, and preach repentance to that incorrigible generation, who perished in their sins, and were in "the prison" of hell, (that is, the adults among them,) when the apostle wrote: being confined there till the judgment of the great day. For they had "sometime been disobedient" and unbelieving, (Note, 2:7,8.) even during the hundred and twenty years of God's longsuffering, after the deluge was predicted, but before it was sent. At that time Noah was occupied in preparing the ark, "showing his faith by his works," and calling them to repent and seek mercy from God. (Notes, Gen. 6:7. Matt. 24:36—41. Heb. 11:7. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) But they unanimously and obstinately rejected his message; and thus they were destroyed by the flood; whilst only eight persons had their lives preserved in the ark, being delivered from the waters and carried above them: so that the floods, which drowned all others, without exception, concurred in their deliverance.—Various other interpretations have been given of this passage; but none of them appears to me in the least degree satisfactory.

V. 21, 22. "The like figure," or the antitype of Noah and his family's preservation in the ark and by the water, at that time saved Christians, even "baptism." Christ is the true Ark. His church is within the ark, and is therefore safe; but all without will be swept by the deluge of divine vengeance into destruction. Into this ark men enter by faith; this faith Jews and Gentiles professed, when by baptism they were admitted into the Christian church; and thus the baptismal water formed as it were the sign of their safety. Yet it was not "the washing away the filth of the flesh," or the mere outward administration of baptism, however rightly done; not the outward sign, the opus operatum, which could effect this, unless it were also rightly received. It was, therefore, "the answer of a good conscience towards God," which saved; namely, when a man, by regeneration of the Spirit, was able to profess repentance, faith, and purposes of a new life, uprightly, and as in the presence of God: and sincerely to answer such questions as were put to persons on those occasions. (Rom. 10:5—11.) When Jews and Gentiles professed Christianity, they were thus received into the church, exactly in the same manner as Gentiles had been into the Jewish church by circumcision: but the argument, concerning the baptism of infants, born of Christian parents, is not at all affected by it. The apostle spoke of baptism, as the initiatory ordinance of Christianity: but he took care to remind men, that the inward grace of baptism, even regeneration, from which all holy affections and actions spring, alone could introduce them into the true church, the Ark or real security; and that no outward administration of baptism could effect this blessed translation into the kingdom of the Son of God.—This salvation of believers was the effect of "the resurrection of Christ," which evidenced the acceptance of his sacrifice, and made way for his exaltation in heavenly glory; that he might confer as a Sovereign, by his power and through his intercession, the blessings which he had purchased by the shedding of his blood. (Notes, Eph. 1:15—23. 4:7—13. Phil. 2:9—11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The truths, precepts, and grace of the gospel, teach men a becoming and beneficial behaviour, in all the relations of life, by a happy union of piety, purity, meekness, fidelity, and holy love; and form them to it.—Every person ought to use all proper means, with earnestness and perseverance, for the conversion of such "as obey not the word," especially among relations; and to aim habitually at gaining others to Christ, by every part of his conduct: but an obliging conscientious performance of their respective duties, by inferiors, will go furthest with superiors, and win most upon them. For when they see, that religion teaches their wives, children, and servants, to behave better towards them than they formerly did; it interests their feelings, and shows them that there is an excellency in what produces such happy effects: and it is greatly to be wished, that there were more who thus enforced genuine Christianity, in every station, employment, and relation of life. (Note, Tit. 2:9,10.)—The inward and incorruptible adorning of wisdom and grace, shining forth "in a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price," constitutes the most durable beauty and amiableness, and will ensure esteem and affection, when all outward ornaments, (the memorial of our sin and shame,) with all that beauty which they are vainly meant to embellish, will not secure any one from contempt and aversion, whose conduct in life is disgraceful: and they will soon leave the poor body to the confinement and corruption of the tomb; and the soul, which is "without holiness," to be for ever loathsome and abhorred of God. Let then all, who would be the followers and daughters of the "holy women, who of old trusted in God," copy their fashion, seek their ornaments, attend to relative duties, do good, fear nothing but sin, and beware of every thing which might betray them into it. And let husbands, professing the gospel, act towards their wives, with that prudent and tender regard which becomes those who know the word of God; which may ensure to them respect from domestics and all around them, and tend to render them comfortable under their various infirmities. Thus husbands and wives will be enabled to live together, "as fellow-heirs of the grace of life," and nothing will hinder their united prayers for a blessing upon each other, upon their children and family, and all who are connected with them.

V. 8—18. As peace and love are necessary to domestic comfort, so are they to the prosperity of the church. Christians should therefore study and pray to be, "all of one mind, to have compassion one of another, to love as brethren, to be compassionate and courteous:" and, instead of "rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing," they should "bless their enemies," after his example who has called them from their state of enmity "to inherit a blessing." But 'how astonishing and lamentable is it, that when the way to happiness is so plainly delineated, so few should find it! What man is there who does not desire life, and to live many days, that he may see good? Yet how few tongues are kept from evil! How few lips from speaking guile! How few decline from evil, and do good! How few seek peace and pursue it! On the contrary, how much low cunning and artifice; and what discords and contentions reign among mankind! And how detestable and miserable do these perverse and ungovernable passions render us!' Doddridge.—But happy are the remnant of the righteous! "The eyes of the Lord watch over them, his ears are open" and attentive "to their prayers," and he delights in doing them good, while he "sets his face against the workers of iniquity."—Who then can harm those that are "followers of God as dear children," and walk in his most holy ways? (Note, Eph. 5:1,2.) Their sufferings, "for righteousness' sake," will prove an addition to their felicity: so that, fearing God, making him their Sanctuary, and abiding safe and comfortable under his protection; they need not fear the terror of the wicked, nor "be troubled" by reason of their rage and malice. They should therefore "always be ready to give a reason of their hope," to inquirers of every description: for it is founded on the most irrefragable arguments; and indeed the true Christian alone can reasonably hope to obtain eternal happiness, or escape eternal misery. Yet in pleading the cause of truth, in public or in private, we should be prepared, not only with conclusive arguments, but "with meekness and fear;" that a humble, benevolent, peaceable conduct towards men, may evidently unite with a reverential awe of the majesty of God: for wrath, pride, bitterness, and irreverence, will prejudice men's minds against the truth, whatever ability is shown in defending it. Nor can this service be successfully performed, except by those who "exercise themselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man:" for nothing can be so well opposed to the enmity of the human heart against the truth, as the holy lives of its professors, which tend to make those "ashamed, who falsely accuse their good conversation in Christ." If this, however, cannot be done, "it is better to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing;" whatever our natural impatience may suggest: for "Christ himself once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God;" and arose from the dead, to accomplish the most gracious design.

V. 19—22. While we recollect the end proposed in the sufferings of the divine Saviour; let us inquire whether we be really brought unto God, as his worshippers, and in the temper of our hearts, and conduct of our lives. For, though his resurrection was attested by the same Spirit, whose divine power effected it; yet few, even to this day, receive him as their Saviour, and flee to him for "refuge from the wrath to come." Nor need we wonder at this, if we consider what a vast majority were disobedient, when Christ, by the same Spirit in believing Noah, preached to the old world, "while the ark was preparing, during the longsuffering of God;" and how few were preserved from the flood: though it may well make us tremble to learn, that the obstinate rebels were cast into prison, never more to be released, as utterly unable "to pay the very last mite." (Note, Matt. 5:25,26.) Let us then enter the Ark which God has provided, as the only security from the deluge of impending vengeance, which will destroy a guilty world: let us beware that we rest not in outward forms: as if that baptism could save us, which only "washes away the filth of the flesh," or any thing but "the answer of a good conscience towards God." While we profess ourselves the disciples of Christ, and partakers of his grace, let us seek the true baptism of the regenerating and sanctifying Spirit of God, in behalf of our children and friends: and thus let us

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. Seeing that Christ, in human nature, and in the likeness of sinful flesh, had suffered with perfect constancy and patience for the sins of his people; (Note, 3:17,18.) his disciples were called on to "arm themselves with the same mind." Thus a resigned, self-denying, meek, steadfast, and intrepid frame of spirit; resulting from confidence in God, love to him, and zeal for his glory: hatred of sin, and realizing views of eternal things, would fortify their minds against despondency, terror, and weariness; and prepare them to resist temptation, and maintain the conflict against the world, the flesh, and the devil, with resolution and vigour, even unto death; being resolved to suffer that last extremity for the sake of Christ, if called to it; whereas without this internal armour, they would surely faint in time of trial. (Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 6:10—20. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) As therefore Christ had "suffered in the flesh" when crucified once for their sins, but had risen from the dead to die no more, and had thus done with sin as imputed to him; (Notes, Heb. 9:27,28.) so Christians, having "suffered in the flesh," in conformity to Christ, by the mortification of their carnal nature, through his grace and motives derived from his cross, had ceased from the practice of sin, expected no satisfaction from any forbidden indulgence, and were continually employed in resisting the influence of sin in their hearts, and endeavouring to prevent its breaking forth in their lives. (Notes, 2:18—25. Rom. 6:1—11. Gal. 2:17—21. 5:22—26. Col. 3:1—4.)—The end or intention of this renewed judgment and conduct in believers, and of the grace by which the change had been wrought, was, that they "should no longer live the remnant of their time in the flesh:" or in the body, "to the lusts of men," or in order to gratify any of those inordinate desires of worldly things, by which men are naturally actuated; but that they should thenceforth "live to the will of God," seeking his favour and glory, and doing his commandments.—The word flesh in these verses, seems to be used in three different senses. It means, 1st. The holy human nature of Christ; 2dly. The depraved nature of man, the body of sin and death; and 3dly. The mortal body, in which the soul tabernacles during its continuance in this world.—The contrast between "the lusts of man," and "the will of God," should be noticed.

V. 3—5. When the ends, for which men were born into the world, had been duly considered; it would appear to the converts to Christianity, whom the apostle addressed, that "the time past of their lives" might abundantly "suffice to have wrought the will of the Gentiles;" or to have wasted life in committing those sins, and pursuing those objects, to which the ignorant heathens were addicted. Some of them had been Gentiles, and the rest had acted according to the manners of the nations, rather than as it became "the peculiar people of God:" for they had habitually allowed themselves in various lascivious imaginations, dalliances, or secret practices, or in more gross lewdness; or they had been guilty of drunkenness and excess; and they had frequented those riotous, luxurious, and dissipated "revellings and banquetings," where intemperance was practised; and many of them had joined in those idolatries which were most detestable both in themselves, and by the shameful and enormous licentiousness connected with them. (Note, Eph. 4:17—19.)—The Jews, at that time, were exceedingly exact and scrupulous, in avoiding all approaches to gross idolatry: it is not therefore at all probable, that the apostle meant this of converts from among them; which confirms the opinion that the epistle was not written exclusively to the Jewish converts.—Some had lived in one, some in another, and several of them in many of these enormities: thus a great part of their lives had been spent to bad purpose; and this reflection ought to render them the more diligent in serving God, for the residue of their days. But their unconverted neighbours, especially the Gentiles, finding them separated from their old pursuits, and set against them; and that they would no longer join with them in their revels, and "profusion of riot," were estranged from them, and looked on them as a precise intractable set of people. The conduct of Christians was a silent reproof of their excesses; and so they "spake evil of them," or "blasphemed" their religion; and charged them with various crimes of which they were not guilty. But whilst they thus unjustly judged and condemned Christians, they must speedily render an account of themselves to him, who was "ready to judge both the living and the dead;" being even then possessed of all power and authority for that purpose. (Marg. Ref. r.) The apostle used the first person, thus joining himself with his Christian brethren; probably, as a less offensive manner of stating the subject; and as conscious, that, though free from many of the gross crimes here mentioned, he had yet spent too many years of his past life, "according to the course of the world," and "to the lusts of men, and not according to the will of God." (Notes, Eph. 2:1—3. Tit. 3:4—7.)—Some learned men indeed venture to change the text, without any authority, and to read "may suffice you:" but the same principle might lead us to explain the words, as addressed exclusively to the Gentile converts: because the Jews had never lived in "abominable idolatries."

V. 6. The gospel had before this been preached to those who were "dead" when the apostle wrote, (either as martyrs for the truth, or dying in the course of providence,) for this very reason, viz. "that they might be judged according to men in the flesh;" and, by the proud and carnal judgment of wicked men, be condemned as evildoers, and some even suffer death at their hands; but that at the same time, being "quickened" to a divine life by the Holy Spirit, they might "live to God" as his devoted servants, and his witnesses among their persecutors; and so be prepared for living with him for ever in heaven. (Note, Rom. 8:10,11.) Thus their transient afflictions, disgrace, and sufferings, soon terminated in perfect felicity. In the mean time, they glorified God in life and death, and were supported and comforted by him: and the gospel had been the means of preparing them for these things, as it still continued to prepare others to glorify God, to "serve their generation," and then, after some fleeting sorrows, to be admitted to everlasting, uninterrupted joy, and unalloyed felicity. (Notes, 3:19,20. 1 Cor. 15:29,30.) This seems the meaning of the verse, which is generally allowed to be obscure. Some explain it of those who were "dead in sin," to whom the gospel was preached; that being quickened and converted, their old nature might be judged, condemned, and crucified, that so they might "no longer live to the lusts of men in the flesh," but to the glory of God by the Spirit.—Several other interpretations are given: but that above stated seems the most satisfactory; and it best connects the verse with the words which immediately precede. "The dead," there means such as had already died; "the quick," or living, those who were then alive on earth: both of these Christ will judge. The gospel was preached, in order to the salvation of the hearers; they who embraced it were condemned according to men, or by man's judgment, but they were accepted by God. The same had been the case with those to whom the gospel had formerly been preached, who were since dead, even those from the beginning who had been favoured with the word of God. Believers had been persecuted and condemned by men; but "they lived according to God in the Spirit," or "by the Spirit;" while their persecutors, if impenitent, would be judged and condemned by the Lord.

V. 7. Christians must expect tribulations in the world, but these would soon terminate; for the "end of all things was at hand," and death was about to close their course of trials or services: nay, judgment would not be so long delayed, as that the intervening space should, in the estimation of faith, be at all compared with eternity. (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. 1 Cor. 7:29—31.) It was therefore incumbent on them to be sober, considerate, temperate in all kinds of animal indulgence, and moderate in all their worldly pursuits. They ought also to be "vigilant," and to guard against the various assaults of their spiritual foes; and especially to be "watchful," that nothing might unfit them for prayer, or lead them to neglect it; or to grow remiss in that duty and means of grace, on which the safety and prosperity of their souls so greatly depended. Many expositors explain "the end of all things," to signify the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the whole constitution of the Jewish nation in church and state. But the Christians in Asia Minor were far distant from Jerusalem, and not immediately concerned in those events; as they and all others were and are in the speedy approach of death and judgment, to which the words most naturally lead our minds, and which alone answer to the full import of them. V. 8. (Notes, 1:22. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Jam. 5:19,20.) The apostle here again enforced the exhortation to charity, or love of each other; and in doing this he referred to the proverb, that "love covereth all sins," or "the multitude of sins." (Note, Prov. 10:12.) As the love of God in Christ "covereth the multitude of the sins" of believers, from his sight; (Note, Ps. 32:1,2.) so they ought to cast the mantle of love over the number of faults, into which their brethren would fall, in their conduct towards them; and thus hide them from their eyes, by forbearing and forgiving one another, as Christ had forgiven them. (Eph. 4:30—32. 5:1,2. Col. 3:13,14.) Thus the peace of the church, and the communion of the saints, might be preserved, which otherwise must be interrupted: for there were so many things amiss in all, that unless love covered, excused, and forgave in others, such mistakes and faults as every one would have need to be borne with in himself, Satan would prevail to excite perpetual divisions and discords among them.—To suppose, that charity, or love, will so cover, or make amends for, the multitude of the man's sins who exercises it, as to induce God to forgive them, is totally subversive of the whole gospel; for "if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died in vain:" and the perversion of these words, which are very obvious and important in their true meaning, has encouraged such numbers to neglect Christ, and continue impenitent in their sins, from a vain hope of being pardoned for the sake of a proud partial benevolence, and some selfish almsdeeds, which by no means constitute the love of which the apostle spoke, (Note, 1 Cor. 13:4—7.) that a particular and repeated protest against it seems absolutely necessary.—'He commends mutual love, because it, as it were, buries innumerable trespasses; and so is a favourer and preserver of peace. For those who love one another, easily forgive each other's offences.' Beza.—Set-love veils and covers our own faults; and its effect, in rendering men blind to their own characters, however quick-sighted in other things, is notorious, and allowed on all sides: now if we truly loved others, as we do ourselves; love would veil and cover their faults also, and render us less keen in noticing and animadverting on them; and more disposed to forbearance and longsuffering towards them.

Fervent.] Εκτενη. Note, 1:22.

V. 9—11. (Notes, Rom. 12:6—13. 1 Tim. 3:2. Heb. 13:1—3. 3 John 5—8.) In general, Christians were exhorted to show their love, by hospitality to strangers, without grudging, or inwardly repining at the expense to which it might put them: and more particularly, whatever gift any man had received of the Lord's free bounty, whether natural abilities, learning, influence, wealth, authority, or spiritual endowments, he was required to employ and improve it for the advantage of his brethren; that so they might all reciprocally be useful to one another, and derive benefit from each other, both in their temporal and spiritual concerns. Thus they would act as good, faithful, wise, and active "stewards" of those manifold talents, which God, of his abundant mercy and "grace," had intrusted to them, for their own and each other's advantage. (Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. 25:14—30. Luke 12:35—46. 16:1—13. 1 Cor. 4:1—5. 2 Cor. 6:1,2.) This especially, though by no means exclusively, concerned ministers, and those employed in managing the affairs of the church.

If any one therefore spoke, either as a public teacher, or in private conversation; let him discourse in consistency with "the oracles of God," which infallibly declare his truth and will to mankind: and if any man acted as a deacon, or in any other way ministered to the support and comfort of believers, or of the poor; let him do it to the best of his ability, as given to him of God for that purpose: and let him communicate to the relief of others, not as if he gave them any thing which was properly his own, but as imparting a portion of what God had, for this end, committed to his stewardship. (Note, 1 Chr. 29:10—19.) That so "God might be glorified," by their conscientious, cheerful, and becoming performance of their several duties, and improvement of their talents, from faith, and in a disposition to give the glory to him of all which they had and did; and to ascribe to him, through Jesus Christ, all the honour of his perfections and wonderful works for evermore.—To restrict this merely to spiritual gifts, because the original word is used, when these are spoken of, (though not used of them exclusively,) may be considered as one of the various ways by which learned commentators endeavour to convince us, that a vast proportion of the Scripture was written, not for our instruction, but for that of others, long since dead; and that we need concern ourselves but little about it. Now this is precisely what a vast majority of professed Christians wish to believe.—Good stewards. (10) Notes, Gen. 24:2—9. 39:2—6. Heb. 3:1—6.

Use hospitality. (9) Φιλοξενοι. 1 Tim. 3:2. Tit. 1:8. Be lovers of strangers. 'The primitive Christians were hospitable to all strangers, but chiefly to those who were of the same faith and communion. V. 12—16. The apostle again exhorted his brethren to patience, fortitude, and cheerfulness, under their sufferings for the sake of Christ. He had before spoken of these, as intended to prove their faith and purify their souls, even as the furnace tries and refines the gold. (Note, 1:6,7.) They ought not, therefore, to be surprised, or become desponding or alarmed, by "the fiery trial which" God had appointed to "try them," and which they must needs pass through; as if some strange thing had happened to them, which was not experienced by others of the Lord's people. (Notes, 3—5. 5:8,9.) On the contrary, they ought to "rejoice," at being conformed to Christ, by suffering from the same description of men, and for the same cause in which he suffered: their trials should be considered as pledges of love, and introductory to the participation of his glory; in order that when that "shall be revealed" at his coming, they may be admitted to partake of it "with exceeding joy." (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:14—23. 2 Cor. 4:8—18. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) —If they were "reproached," because they bare the name, professed the truth, and obeyed the commands of Christ; they were "happy" and favoured persons. (Notes, 3:13—16. Is. 51:7,8. 66:5,6. Matt. 5:10—12. 10:24—26. Luke 6:21—26.) This evinced, that the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of glory, who is glorious in his eternal Deity, and the Author of all that is truly glorious or excellent in men, namely the divine image, the beginning of heavenly glory, "even the Spirit of God," rested upon them. (Notes, Num. 11:25,26,28,29. 2 Kings 2:16—18. Is. 11:2—5. 59:20,21.) Thus the glory of God was seen in their conduct and dispositions: and this excited the enmity of the "carnally minded:" so that on the part of their revilers and persecutors, the Holy Spirit and his operations, as well as Christ and the Father who sent him, were evil-spoken of and blasphemed; but "on their part God was glorified," as they patiently suffered, for his sake, the effects of that enmity which their loyal profession and conduct had excited. The case, however, would be evidently different, if they exposed themselves to sufferings by their crimes; for this would be most dishonourable to God, and injurious to themselves. It behooved them, therefore, to be careful, that none of them were brought before the magistrates, cast into prison, or condemned, for committing murder, or theft, or any other violation of wholesome laws; nay, that they did not incur reproach by intermeddling in the affairs of other men, whether they were of a private or a public nature, especially on political subjects; or by passing their judgment and censures, or intruding into the management of those concerns, which did not belong to them: as if they had been appointed, or were authorized and qualified, to oversee and give orders to those employed. These were common reasons for men's suffering public punishment or private reproach; and professors of Christianity might be drawn into such misconduct, and yet vainly imagine that they were persecuted for their religion! But if they avoided such imputations, and suffered as Christians for acting consistently with that honourable character; they ought by no means to be ashamed of the reproach connected with their punishment; though it were imprisonment, scourging, or even a violent and ignominious death: nay, they ought rather to praise and glorify God for "counting them worthy to suffer shame for his sake." V. 17—19. It was indeed to be expected, that Christians would be thus called to suffer for Christ's sake: for the time predicted by him, when he would begin his judgments, by first sharply trying his professed disciples, or the family of God, was then arrived; and if "fiery trials" must prove and purify the church, and purge out hypocrites from among them, before judgments were executed on the Jewish nation, and other open enemies; "what would be the end of those who did not obey the gospel?" The persecutions, by which the church was tried, were introductory to the destruction of Jerusalem and the tremendous ruin of the Jews; and preparatory to "the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." (Notes, Ez. 9:5—7. Matt. 24:9—14. John 16:1—3. 2 Pet. 3:5—7.) If then the righteous were saved with difficulty; if, notwithstanding their relation to Christ, and union with him, and their conscientious self-denying obedience, so many trials, dangers, conflicts, and sufferings, were deemed needful for them; and if, according to their own feelings and apprehensions, they were often but just saved, and got to heaven at last, through many narrow escapes, as a shipwrecked mariner scarcely gains the shore on a plank: (Notes, Acts 27:29—32,42—44.) where would ungodly men, of every kind, where would the sinner, the profligate and vicious, the impenitent, the despiser, or opposer of Christianity, appear at the day of judgment? (Note, Rom. 5:6—10.) What refuge from the wrath of God could he expect to find? Or how could he hope to escape the everlasting punishment with which he was threatened in the holy Scriptures? As therefore the trials of Christians were trivial, compared either with "the perdition of ungodly men," or the felicity prepared for the righteous; (Note, 2 Cor. 4:13—18.) they ought, when suffering in the cause and according to the will of God, to commit the keeping of their souls (as well as the protection of their lives, and all their other concerns) to his almighty care; who, being their Creator, had a property in them as his rational creatures, and who regarded them as his redeemed servants new created unto holiness, and interested in all the blessings of his covenant, and in his faithfulness to perform it to them. Taking care, therefore, to persevere "in well-doing," and to suffer with meekness, patience, and constancy, without turning aside, either through fear, resentment, or worldly motives; let them trust themselves to his faithful care, who, being the Creator of the world, could not want power to support, comfort, deliver, and eternally save them; and who, as now become their Saviour, would certainly overrule every thing to their final advantage.—'The apostle cannot intend deliverance from the Roman invasion, in which so few of these Christians were concerned; nor merely deliverance from any of their persecutors; because he takes it for granted, that "the righteous would be saved," though with difficulty; whereas multitudes fell by persecution, even of these Christians in Bithynia, as appears by Pliny's letter. It is necessary therefore to understand it more generally, of the difficulty with which good men get to heaven, through this dangerous and ensnaring world.' Doddridge.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The Christian soldier, in preparing for the battle, must peculiarly remember to "arm himself with the same mind" which was in Christ, the Captain of our salvation; that love, zeal, spirituality, hatred of sin, contempt of the world, fortitude, patience, meekness, and hope, may concur in determining him to venture and suffer all things, for the glory of God, the good of men, and "the joy set before him." (Notes, Phil. 2:5—11. P. O. 1—11. Note, Heb. 12:1—3.) Thus, being "crucified with Christ," by the virtue of his "sufferings for us in the flesh;" and deeming himself "dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God;" he will be enabled to resist temptation, to "cease from sin, and no longer to live the rest of his time in the flesh, to the lusts of men, but to the will of God." Indeed we may all say, (though some far more emphatically than others,) that "the time past of our lives should suffice us to have wrought the will" of those "who know not God;" and we cannot but regret, if brought to our right mind, that so large a proportion of our precious time has been wasted to no purpose, or employed to bad purpose; whether we have escaped the grosser "pollutions of the world," or have walked in its lasciviousness, lusts, excess, and riot: or in those "revellings and banquetings," where God is no more regarded, and often more outraged, than amidst the "abominable idolatries" of the Gentiles. Very few of us indeed have avoided the indulgent and dissipated feasts, and banquetings, which professed Christians both in the higher and lower classes of society generally make, and that often under pretence of commemorating some of the events relating to redemption: (Note, Ex. 32:1. P. O. 1—14.) but, when we separate from them, and refuse to "run with them to the same excess of riot" they "think it strange," and revile us; because by our conduct we condemn them. (Note, John 7:3—10.) This we must not regard: but, having shown our reasons as far as we have opportunity, we must leave them "to him who is ready to judge the quick and the dead;" to whom, if they continue impenitent, they will have a dreadful account to give at the last day.—Vast numbers, who are now dead, have suffered the same revilings before us: the gospel called them to separate from the wickedness of their former companions in sin, and to bear testimony against it: they were therefore "judged according to men in the flesh," as deserving reproach and persecution; but "they lived according to God in the Spirit:" and when they were removed out of the world, they were found "meet to be partakers of the heavenly inheritance." Ours is indeed a favoured day in this respect: yet if "the Spirit of life" dwell in us, the world will judge us deserving of scorn and reproach, whilst God will graciously account us "worthy of that glorious kingdom for which we suffer."

V. 7—11. "The end of all things is at hand." All our worldly pursuits, possessions, distinctions, and enjoyments; all our temporal trials, sorrows, and conflicts; our season of probation and preparation; and our term of usefulness will speedily, very speedily be over: it behooves us then "to be sober, and to watch unto prayer." (Notes, Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4.)—The more ungodly men hate and revile believers, the greater care should they use to have "fervent love among themselves;" that, by mutual candour, long-suffering and forgiveness, "the multitude of offences may be covered;" and so nothing may interrupt their peace and harmony. This blessed grace of love dethrones our natural selfishness, and, in connexion with faith in the promises of God, it induces us to "use hospitality one to another without grudging;" and to consider every gift, possession, or situation, as a talent committed to our stewardship, according to "the manifold grace of God," to be used for the benefit of the church and the community. It also dictates or regulates our words, whether in public or in private, that they may be true, pure, kind, and instructive, "according to the oracles of God;" and it disposes every one, in his proper calling, to minister or communicate to others, "as of the ability which God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ;" to whom "be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

V. 12—19. When we consider the upright, harmless, benevolent, and useful conduct of true Christians, we are apt to "think it strange," that they must pass through "fiery trials," from the enmity of wicked men, and that God should

CHAPTER V.

The apostle exhorts "the elders to feed the flock of God," willingly, cheerfully, disinterestedly, and humbly; and to be examples to it; expecting from the chief Shepherd, at his appearance, an unfading crown of glory, 1—4. He requires the younger to submit to the elder; and all of them to be "clothed with humility," "casting all their care on" God, 5—7; and to be "sober and vigilant;" and steadfastly, by faith, to "resist the devil," and bear tribulation, 8, 9. He concludes with prayers, salutations, and benedictions, 10—14.

permit them to be injured and afflicted. We must not, however, indulge such thoughts, but prepare for tribulation; as the "excellent of the earth" have always been thus treated, and God has purified all his gold in this furnace. We ought therefore to "rejoice in being made partakers of the sufferings of Christ, that when his glory shall be revealed, we may be glad also with exceeding" and eternal "joy." We may indeed deem ourselves "happy," when wicked men discern "the seal of God in our forehead," and "reproach us for the name of Christ;" because "the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon us;" and they revile us, because we bear his image, belong to him, and glorify him.—But we cannot be too careful not to give the enemies of the gospel any just cause to revile or hate us. It is not indeed common for professors of evangelical truths to suffer as murderers, thieves, or malefactors; yet they often bring odium upon themselves by a conceited officiousness, and by intermeddling with such concerns as do not at all belong to them, especially in political matters; as well as by various other evident and palpable faults: and then many of them unjustly impute the reproach cast on them, to the persecuting malice of their enemies! This we should watch against; and carefully distinguish between those things which we suffer "for the sake of Christ and of righteousness," and those that we bring on ourselves by imprudence and misconduct. In the former case, if we bear our trials with meekness and constancy, "we suffer as Christians, and should glorify God in that behalf;" in the latter, we should be silent, or humbly confess our sin and folly as the cause of our sorrows.—In vain do men expect to escape the trial of their professed faith: "judgment will begin at the house of God;" his people will be more severely chastised for their sins than other men are; and hypocrites will incur the deepest condemnation. (Notes, Am. 3:1—3. Zech. 13:8,9. Mal. 3:1—4. Matt. 3:7—12.) They who would be saved, must strive, wrestle, labour, watch, pray, deny themselves, and "take up their cross daily:" and though all true believers will "surely be saved," it will be with difficulty, and through many perils, conflicts, and tribulations. (P. O. Acts 27:21—44.) "What then will be the end of those who obey not the gospel of God?" and where will the infidel, the profligate, the licentious, the oppressor, the persecutor, and the enemy of all goodness appear, when Christ shall come to judge the world? If such sufferings are inflicted on the beloved children of God, what will be the doom of his implacable foes? And if such diligence and watchfulness only just suffice to ensure the believer's salvation; what will be the event of the slothful and heedless conduct of professed Christians in general? (Notes and P. O. Luke 13:22—30. Notes, 1 Cor. 9:24—27. P. O. 19—27. Notes and P. O. 2 Pet. 1:5—11.) Let us then see to it, that we "obey the gospel" by a penitent "faith working by love;" and, if called to "suffer, according to the will of God;" "let us commit the keeping of our souls to him, in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator," and as in Christ become our Omnipotent Saviour. (Note, Is. 12:2.)

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—4. "The elders" were, in general, the rulers and teachers of the churches: (Notes, Acts 11:27—30. 14:21—23. 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1.) and St. Peter, waving the mention of his apostolical office, addressed them as being himself one of the company, and as acquainted with the nature and difficulties of the service assigned to them. He had also been a spectator of the sufferings of Christ, in the garden, and probably on the cross; and was especially appointed to bear witness of those interesting events, and of his Lord's resurrection, ascension, and subsequent exaltation. (Note, Heb. 12:1.) Moreover, he was fully assured, that, as a pardoned and justified believer, and as sealed by the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, he was called to inherit, and would at length partake of, "the glory which shall be revealed," and publicly bestowed on all true Christians, when the Lord Jesus shall come to judge the world. (Note, John 13:36—38.) As therefore he was employed in preaching the gospel of salvation, through the sufferings of the Redeemer, whose steps he endeavoured to follow, in patiently bearing afflictions for the truth's sake; and as he was supported by the joyful expectation of future felicity to disregard present things, even in constant expectation of ending his life by crucifixion, whilst, from love to Christ, he fed his sheep and lambs; (Notes John 21:15—23.) he exhorted all those who were appointed to the same work, to apply themselves diligently to the performance of it, with the self-denying tenderness and patient care with which the shepherd feeds and tends his flock. (Notes, Luke 12:22—34. Acts 20:28.) They ought to consider the congregations, over which they severally presided, and among whom they laboured, as a part of the "purchased" and beloved "flock of God;" and so "take the oversight of them," not merely because "necessity was laid upon them," and they could not safely do otherwise; but "willingly," from zeal to the glory of God, and love to the souls of his people; and as men who were ready to encounter difficulties, face dangers, and endure losses, reproaches, and persecutions in so good a work. (Note, 1 Cor. 9:13—18.) And when the counsel of inspired persons, or other pious ministers, concurring with the wants and desires of the people, called on any one to engage in the pastoral office, he ought not to feel reluctant to it, as some were found to be; partly from modesty and diffidence, yet not without a measure of unbelief, and undue regard to the ease, quiet, and safety of a private situation, the want of zeal and love, or the preference of more profitable employments: whence it became necessary, almost to constrain them to engage in this arduous, laborious, and perilous work. This is generally supposed to be implied; yet the charge is made to those who were already elders. At the same time, some improper persons of inferior stations might be induced to undertake the office of the ministry, from the expectation and desire of a better maintenance than they could otherwise obtain; (Note, Jam. 3:1,2.) and such as had been ordained, might be tempted to go through with their services, rather to secure their incomes, than from better motives, and to modify their instructions in subserviency to their own interests: but such things must scrupulously be avoided: as the lucre thus sought would be most filthy and base, and the wages of the vilest prostitution. (Notes, John 10:10—13. 1 Tim. 3:3,8—15. Tit. 1:5—13.) For all true ministers should enter into that office, and perform its duties, "of a ready mind," delighting in the work, and desirous of glorifying God, and of being his instruments in doing good to the souls of men; considering their own temporal interests as a matter of a very inferior nature; and even their maintenance merely as necessary in order to the due performance of their office, and not an object to be proposed by them, in undertaking or conducting it. Nor ought they to assume a "lordly authority," or aspire at secular power and honour, by means of their ministry; as if they had "dominion over the faith" or consciences of those who belonged to God, as "the lot of his inheritance;" when they were appointed to show them his truth and will, (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:23,24. 4:7.) and to engage their obedience to him, not to themselves. (Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. Luke 22:24—27.) Instead, therefore, of usurping authority over their brethren, or endeavouring to convert their office into a lucrative trade; they ought to behave in such a manner, as to be "examples to the flock," and to elucidate by their own piety, purity, humility, self-denial, and universal conscientiousness, the instructions which they gave to the people. (Notes, 1 Tim. 4:11—16. Tit. 2:7,8.) This would not indeed tend to their worldly affluence or dignity; but it would ensure to them a most abundant future recompense. For "when the chief Shepherd," (Notes, Ps. 23:1—3. Ez. 34:23—31. Zech. 13:7. John 10:10—18. Heb. 13:20,21.) from whom their pastoral charge was derived, on whom they depended for all their sufficiency, to whom the flock belonged, and to whom they must finally give account, "shall appear" as "the Judge of the world;" then they, and all such faithful ministers, will receive a crown of unfading glory, infinitely better and more honourable than all the authority, reputation, wealth, and pleasure of the world, could possibly be. (Notes, Matt. 25:19—23,31—34. 1 Cor. 4:2—5. 1 Thes. 2:17—20. 1 Tim. 6:11—16. 2 Tim. 4:1—8.)

This must be allowed a decisive testimony, that no express distinction between presbyters and bishops was at the time, when the apostle wrote, established in the church. It would however be well, if desisting from such controversies about precedency, all, whether called bishops, or archbishops, presbyters, or elders, of every church, would more study, and endeavour to practise the admirable lessons here inculcated.—Alas, how small a proportion of nominal ministers of Christianity, either in the more exalted orders, or among their often too much depressed inferiors, so preach, labour, and live, as to give an impartial student of the Bible reason to conclude, that "when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they will receive the crown of unfading glory."—By constraint.] Αναγκαστως. V. 5—7. The word "younger" (νεωτεροι, Luke 22:26.) does not seem here to relate to any particular station in the church: but in general denotes juniors, whether in the pastoral office or not, who were exhorted to "submit themselves," and show deference to their seniors, as well as to "the elders of the church." (Notes, 1 Tim. 5:1,2. Tit. 2:3—6.) Yea, all Christians were directed to be "subject to one another," according to their different relations in life: thus the people should obey their pastors, children their parents, subjects their rulers, and servants their masters, according to the precepts of God's word. (Lev. 19:32. Notes, Ex. 20:12. Eph. 5:21.) And as pride, in juniors and inferiors, militates against due subordination, even as in superiors it prompts to tyranny; so they all were admonished to be clothed with humility, as their chief ornament, or rather their outward garment: that whatever abilities, endowments, or spiritual gifts they possessed, their modesty and humility might be conspicuous to all beholders, more than any other distinction. This ought above all things to be sought for; seeing that God contended by his omnipotence against all proud persons, showing favour to none but those who were deeply sensible of their unworthiness; and conferring this special grace on all who were thus humbly desirous of it. (Notes, Jam. 4:4—10.)—It therefore behooved all men to "humble themselves," as guilty, polluted, and wretched sinners: under the "powerful hand of God," which was sufficient to crush his stoutest enemy, and to uphold his feeblest friend: that so, submitting to his righteousness, they might be reconciled to him by faith in Christ, and in due time exalted to the glory, honour, and immortality prepared for his saints, after the trials here allotted them.—In the mean while, indeed, they would meet with various difficulties, and might be assaulted by many solicitous cares, about their temporal or spiritual concerns, and those of the church: but, being attentive to their present duties, they were encouraged, and required to cast all their anxieties upon the Lord, by faith and prayer; assured that he would manage every thing for their advantage, according to his unerring wisdom and unfailing truth; seeing he "cared for them;" he pitied, and loved, and would manage the concerns of all those who thus trusted in him. V. 8, 9. The apostle here again renewed his exhortation to sobriety and vigilance; (Notes, 1:13—16. 4:7.) that, being free from the intoxication of sensual and dissipated pleasures, or worldly interests, the Christians whom he addressed might not be lulled asleep, or found off their guard in the great concerns of eternity. (Note, Luke 21:34—36.) To excite them to this watchfulness, they must be reminded, that "the devil," the "prince of the darkness of this world," and of the apostate angels, "the accuser of the brethren," and "the adversary" of believers, who always seized on every opportunity of bringing some charge against them, or of obtaining leave to sift and harass them, was "walking about, like a roaring lion," full of rage and fierceness, seeking whom he could find asleep or unarmed, that he might at once devour him, or swallow him up. (Notes, Job 1:6—12. Zech. 3:1—4. Luke 22:31—34. Rev. 12:7—12.) The terrible persecutions which were instigated by this enemy of God and man, as "working in the children of disobedience," seem to be peculiarly intended. Thus outward terrors, and inward suggestions, drove numbers into apostacy, or a temporary denial of Christ; many were finally ruined, from fear of man, and love of life; and others narrowly escaped this downfal, being found careless and secure. All Christians then ought to resist and repel his assaults; being "steadfast" in the profession of the faith, assuredly believing the truths of the gospel, and constantly depending on the power and love of Christ to repel and drive away the hated tempter. And to excite them thus strenuously to resist temptation, and "strive against sin," though it were even unto imprisonment, cruel mockings, stripes, or death: they should be fully informed, and know assuredly, that "their brethren," dispersed in other parts of the world, constantly endured afflictions of the same kind, in the same cause, and from the same sort of persons.—These repeated exhortations to "watchfulness," and the especial motive assigned for it, ought to have peculiar weight; as coming from that apostle, who, through self-confidence, carnal security, and unwatchfulness, when "Satan desired to sift him" and his brethren "as wheat," was induced to deny his Lord with solemn oaths and dire imprecations. V. 10, 11. The apostle did not pray, that his brethren might be exempted from salutary and honourable trials: but he besought "the God of all grace," (Marg. Ref. n.) being plenteous in mercy, and the inexhaustible and only Source of every kind and measure of grace; who, by his word and Spirit, had "called them to the hope" and sure earnest of "eternal glory," through Jesus Christ; (Note, 1 Thes. 2:9—12.) that, "after they had suffered awhile," for the trial and increase of their faith, he would make them mature and complete in holiness; establish them in the peace and hope of the gospel, strengthen them to resist all kinds of temptations, to endure all sufferings, and to perform all duties, by invigorating their holy affections; (Notes, 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13. Col. 1:9—14.) and that he would settle them, firm and immoveable, as a compact building on a good foundation, so that no storms, assaults, or stratagems of the enemy, might overthrow them. (Notes, Matt. 7:24—27. Eph. 3:14—19. Col. 2:5—7.) This would redound to his praise, as the work of his power and sovereign authority, to whom all glory and dominion ought be, and eventually would be, universally and eternally ascribed.

therefore taken the opportunity of writing by him a brief epistle, exhorting them to be steadfast, and to act consistently with their Christian profession. He also testified to the gospel which they had received; to satisfy them, that the doctrines of grace which they had embraced, and in the faith and experience of which they stood accepted with God, were indeed the truths of Christ; and that the power of them upon their hearts, and the fruits of them in their lives, evinced them to be partakers of the grace of God, and fully established in his favour.—This confirms the supposition, that St. Peter wrote to establish in the faith the same churches, which had been planted by St. Paul and his companions; against all the insinuations of those, who endeavoured to persuade the Gentile converts, that he preached a different doctrine than the other apostles did: and indeed the attentive reader will remark a great similarity in the sentiments of those two great apostles; especially in the manner in which they connect doctrine and practice together.

There is no sufficient ground to suppose, that by Babylon the apostle mystically meant Rome; for no reason can be assigned, why he should withhold the name of that city, when he wrote this epistle. Yet if any choose to avail themselves of this only scriptural proof, that Peter ever resided at this great antichristian metropolis; Protestants are not concerned to controvert it. It is, however, generally allowed, that Peter went to Rome, and there suffered martyrdom.—It is not certain, whether Marcus is, or is not, the same with John Mark, mentioned frequently by St. Paul, and in the Acts of the Apostles. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. Those who most know the nature, difficulties, snares, and temptations of the pastoral office, are best qualified to exhort their brethren; and they will speak with the most impressive authority on such topics. (Note, Matt. 7:28:29.) So to contemplate the sufferings of Christ, as to understand the design of them, and experience their effects, in humbling and sanctifying the heart, gives the best grounded confidence of being "partakers of the glory which shall be revealed;" and they, who would counsel to the greatest effect, must not needlessly or habitually use the language of superiority or command.—Ministers should unite skill, vigilance, diligence, faithfulness, love, zeal, patience, disinterestedness, and self-abasement, in their characters and conduct; both in order "to feed the flock of God," and to be "examples unto them." They ought to perform the most laborious services, and endure the greatest hardships, for "the Lord's heritage," "not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind," and without assuming any "dominion over their faith."—This is not, indeed, the road to high preferments in the outward church, nay, it leads far from it: but "when the chief Shepherd shall appear," such pastors "shall receive" of him "a crown of glory that will never fade away." And what, compared with this, are all those riches, eminent stations, or lordly dignities, which so many nominal pastors eagerly pursue? Or where will the avaricious, the slothful, the sensual, or the tyrannical men, who have borne the name of ministers, appear, when the great Judge shall come, and call them to give an account of their stewardship? (Notes and P. O. Is. 56:9—12. Ez. 31:1—9. Note, Zech. 11:15—17.) The sentence to be then denounced against them, and executed on them, is already recorded: may they read it, and tremble, and "flee from the wrath to come!" (Note, Matt. 24:45—51.)—But every station and age has its peculiar duties: subordination is the universal plan and appointment of God; the younger should submit themselves unto the elder; and all, in their several relations, should be subject to those placed over them. This will be the case, as far as men "are clothed with humility;" and God never shows favour to a proud man, except when he brings him down into the dust of self-abasement: (Note, Dan. 4:34—37.) nor will any humble soul come short of his grace, or of eternal life. Let us then "humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God," for he is able to save and to destroy: then "he will exalt us in due time," as much as is good for us, in his church on earth, and among "his saints in glory everlasting."—When we become humbly subject to our reconciled God, and simply dependent on him; we are allowed and commanded to "cast all our care on him," and assured "that he careth for us," as a Father for his own children: and this will bring far sweeter peace and greater comfort into the soul than could arise from the most complete gratification of pride, ambition, avarice, or any worldly affections. Thus also we shall be safe: for humility will induce us to be "sober and vigilant," diligently attending to our duty: simply depending on the Lord in all things, and patiently submitting to his whole will concerning us. This is our part, and thus we may unreservedly and cheerfully leave all events to the God to whom alone they belong.

V. 8—14. When we consider the indefatigable malice, power, and subtlety of "our adversary the devil, who goeth about seeking whom he may devour," and recollect what numbers he continually destroys; we cannot but perceive our indispensable need of vigilance, and confidence in God, and constant fervent prayer for protection and deliverance. Did a roaring lion at any time traverse our streets, devouring numbers of the careless and inattentive; and we were informed of it, by indisputable testimony; we should proceed with great caution and circumspection, if obliged to go out in such perilous circumstances: yet a far more formidable enemy continually watches his opportunity of destroying our souls; God himself gives us the information and alarm; and we cannot have any safety except we "watch and are sober." But, alas! how little do we take the warning, and act as if we really believed this to be the case! Yet in this way alone can we reasonably hope to be kept from falling into temptation, and being overcome by it. (Notes, Matt. 6:13. 26:40,41. Luke 22:31—34,39—46.)—If, however, we must encounter this dreadful foe, we should "resist him steadfast in the faith," and then the Lord will constrain him to "flee from us." In whatever form he assaults us, or by whatever agents, we may know assuredly, that our brethren in all parts of the world experience similar conflicts, temptations, and tribulations. We should, therefore, when rescued from urgent danger, nay, while resisting, steadfast in the faith, pray for them also, that after they have suffered awhile, the "God of all grace would perfect, stablish, strengthen, and settle them." This he will do for all, whom he has "called to his eternal glory by Jesus Christ;" that they may celebrate his praises, as his willing subjects for ever and ever.—All the apostles and evangelists exhort us to these things, and "testify that this is the true grace of God:" may we then steadfastly adhere to this primitive Christianity, and not listen to "cunningly devised fables!" Thus it will appear that we were elected together with those who are now in glory; that we are indeed faithful brethren with all the family of God; that we desire to live in love with them, and to share that peace which belongs to all that are "in Christ Jesus," and to them exclusively.

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

The writer of this epistle calls himself "Simon Peter," (1:1. Acts 15:14. Gr.) 'an apostle of Jesus Christ;" he alludes to circumstances and facts, which agree to none but Peter; (1:14—16. John 21:19.) he calls it his "second epistle;" (3:1.) and he speaks of his "beloved brother, Paul." (3:15.) It must, therefore, either be the work of the apostle Peter, or of one who personated him: but 'it is a thing of the worst example, for any man to forge another's name, or pretend to be the person he is not' Le Clerc. It may be added, 'especially to forge the name of an apostle, and to personate him, in order to sanction a man's private opinions by so high an authority.' Yet the epistle is remarkable for the energy with which the writer inculcates holiness; and the solemn, yet affectionate manner, in which he testifies against the delusions of those who neglect it. It has indeed been urged, that the style remarkably differs from that of St. Peter's first epistle: but this is by no means true, except in respect to a part of the second chapter, which in fact seems to have been taken, in a measure, at least, from some writing which described, in very strong language, the false prophets of that age, or of earlier ages; which was then extant, and well known, but is now lost. St. Jude seems also to have taken some things from it; for part of his epistle greatly coincides with the second chapter of this. In all other respects the internal characters of authenticity are very strong.—Some doubts, however, in this respect, were entertained in the primitive church; which Jerome ascribes to the supposed dissimilarity of style. But, it is probable, that it was written only a short time before the apostle's martyrdom; and, not having been so publicly avowed by him, and clearly known to be his, during his lifetime, the scrupulous caution of the church hesitated about admitting it into the sacred canon; till internal evidence fully convinced the most competent judges that it was entitled to that high distinction. It is generally supposed to have been written at least three or four years after the former epistle; and it is evident, that primarily it was intended for the same persons, though not expressly addressed to them.—It appears, that the apostle, by this epistle, especially designed to put Christians upon their guard against the false apostles and teachers, who perverted the gospel; and the profane scoffers, who started objections to the truth of it: but it is replete with the most important instructions on a variety of subjects.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle salutes his brethren, 1, 2. He shows the blessings to which God had called them; and earnestly exhorts them to diligence in every good work, in order to make "their calling and election sure;" intermixing suitable warnings and encouragements, 3—11. He states, that aware of his approaching martyrdom, he is the more diligent, in thus admonishing them, that they might remember these things after his decease, 12—15. He urges the evidence of what he had seen and heard "in the holy mount," in confirmation of his testimony concerning the power and coming of Christ, 16—18; referring them to the "more sure word of prophecy," 19; and instructing them, concerning the interpretation and source of it, 20, 21.

SIMON [a]Peter, [b]a servant and [c]an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that [d]have obtained a like precious faith with us [e]through the righteousness [f]of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ:

2 [f]Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through [g]the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord,

3 According as [h]his divine power hath given unto us [i]all things that pertain unto life and godliness, [k]through the knowledge of him that hath [l]called us [m]to glory and [n]virtue:

4 Whereby [o]are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these [p]ye might be partakers of the divine nature, [q]having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. Perhaps Peter deemed it proper to style himself "an apostle," as well as "a servant of Christ;" because he meant in this epistle to oppose certain false teachers, who did great mischief in the church. He addressed himself to "them who had obtained like precious faith with him" and his brethren. The nature and effects of true faith are "precious," and it interests the possessor in the most valuable blessings: it was therefore equally precious in a private Christian, and in an apostle. Thus he tacitly distinguished "the faith of God's elect," from that dead and worthless faith, by which many were deluded. (Notes, Tit. 1:1—4. Jam. 2:14—26.) This faith, which, as the original intimates, they received by the special favour and allotment of God, rested on "the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ," as the words may be literally rendered. (Marg.) Thus they were taught to believe and trust in the obedience unto death of the Lord Jesus, as their incarnate God and Saviour, for their justification, and for all the blessings connected with it, and resulting from it. This is the most obvious meaning of the words; but if any contend that the expression "our God" refers to the Father; they should also remember that the meritorious obedience of the incarnate Son is often called "the righteousness of God." (Notes, Rom. 1:17. 3:21—26. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Phil. 3:8—11.) Nor can we form any idea in what sense a Christian's faith could be said to be either in, or "through the righteousness" or justice of God, considered merely as a divine attribute; when it rests mainly on the mercy and truth of God, and only views his justice as satisfied, and, as it were, consenting to the sinner's salvation, through the meritorious work of Christ.—Our translation, "through the righteousness," though it seems not to be the exact sense of the passage, yet conveys a very important meaning: as the faith, by which we receive Christ for salvation, is given to us "through the righteousness," which he finished as our Surety; for it springs from the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, as given to us through his mediation. (Note, John 1:10—12.)—In behalf, however, of all such Christians, the apostle prayed that "grace and peace might be multiplied to them, through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord." (Notes, John 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6.) For, in proportion to the degree of our believing, spiritual, and experimental knowledge of the perfections of God, in the harmony and glory of them, as displayed in the Person, character, and salvation of Jesus our Lord, all our gracious affections will be exercised: and our peace, hope, and consolation will abound, even as that knowledge abounds in us. (Notes, 3:17,18. Col. 1:9—14.)

Simon. (1) Συμεων. Acts 15:14. Some copies read Simon.—Through.] Ev. In, with, by, for, from, for the sake of; rarely through. The apostle Paul having used εν for several verses; when the idea of through occurred to him, changes εν for δια with the genitive, (2 Cor. 6:4—8.) which is not observed in our version. (Comp. 3 with 3:18. Gr.)

V. 3, 4. It might be expected by Christians, that the progressive work of illumination, sanctification, and consolation, would be carried on in them, according to what "the divine power" of the Lord Jesus had already conferred. (Note, Eph. 3:20,21.) In consequence of his exaltation, and mediatorial authority, "his divine power" had given to his people "all things pertaining to life and godliness;" whatever was requisite for their spiritual and eternal life and final felicity, and for their acting suitably to their relations and obligations to God, during their passage through this evil world to heaven. Instructions, motives, encouragements, means, principles, and assistances, together with pardon, peace, and grace, had been "given them," through the regeneration of the Holy Spirit; and all the fulness of Christ, and the engagements of the everlasting covenant, had been set before them "in the word of the gospel:" so that, notwithstanding inward and outward impediments and conflicts, they might still be enabled to serve God acceptably in this world, and obtain everlasting life in the world to come. (Notes, Tit. 2:11—14.) All these things had been freely bestowed on them, "through the knowledge of God, who had called them" by his glorious grace and mercy, and the "virtue," or energy, of his quickening Spirit: or, he had called them to partake of "his eternal glory," and to a constant and courageous profession of the gospel, and obedience to Christ, amidst all the trials and sufferings of their present state. For the words "glory and virtue," may either refer to God who called them, or that by which they were called: the former seems the more literal construction; but the unusual use of the word rendered virtue, in applying it to God, has induced most expositors to adopt the latter interpretation. Yet the same word is used, in this application of it, by St. Peter in another place. (1 Pet. 2:9. Gr.)—By this "knowledge of God" in Christ, through the gospel, and by their efficacious calling, "exceedingly great and precious promises had been given them."—The promises of Scripture relate to things most needful to sinners, suitable to their case answerable to all their wants, and abundantly sufficient when

5 And [b]beside this, [r]giving all diligence, add to your faith, [s]virtue; and to virtue, [t]knowledge;

6 And to knowledge, [u]temperance; and to temperance, [x]patience; and to patience, [y]godliness;

7 And to godliness, [z]brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, [a]charity.

8 For if these things be [b]in you, [c]and abound, [d]they make you that ye shall neither be [e]barren nor [f]unfruitful [g]in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9 But he that [h]lacketh these things is [i]blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath [j]forgotten [k]that he was purged from his old sins.

10 Wherefore the rather, brethren, [l]give diligence [m]to make your calling and [n]election sure: for [o]if ye do these things, ye shall [p]never fall:

11 For so [q]an entrance shall be ministered unto you [q]abundantly into the [r]everlasting kingdom of [s]our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

fulfilled to them, as believers, to render them most blessed for evermore. Whereas, without the promises, they must have been for ever miserable: they are therefore "exceedingly great and precious" even beyond expression. These are set before men, by the gospel, who are invited to come and partake of the promised blessings: but they are given to believers alone, who may consider them as so many valuable securities, or good bills, payable when their circumstances and best interests render it necessary: for, being united to Christ, and partakers of him, all the promises belong to them through him and by his covenant. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:17—20.)—They were moreover bestowed on them, to the end that they "might be partakers of the divine nature," instead of that depraved and diabolical nature, which they had as apostate sinners; that, by their union with Christ, and the in-dwelling and new creating power of the Holy Spirit, the divine image might be renewed upon their souls; that so a new nature might be formed within them, and a new direction given to their understandings, wills, and affections; conformable to the holy nature of God, and capable of loving and delighting in him, and finding happiness in his service. (Notes, Gen. 1:26,27. Rom. 12:2. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. Eph. 4:20—24. Col. 3:7—11.) When this change of heart and nature was begun in regeneration, it influenced those who experienced it, to separate "and escape from the pollution that was in the world through lust;" or from all those outward vices and enormities, into which men are drawn, by their excessive and idolatrous cravings after the pleasures, possessions, or distinctions of the world. Such evil practices have always filled the earth, and they are pollution and filthiness in the judgment of God.—When sinners profess to repent, and to embrace the gospel, they outwardly relinquish these iniquities: (Notes, 2:20—22. Matt. 12:43—45.) and all regenerate persons actually and finally escape them; that is, the allowed or habitual practice of any of them.

V. 5—7. The apostle here called on his Christian brethren not to rest in their apparent conversion, or the reformation connected with it, or even in the beginning of a renewal to a "divine nature;" but, depending on the promises of the gospel, and pursuing the end for which they were given, to "cleanse themselves from all" remaining "filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God." (Note, 2 Cor. 7:1.) Beyond, and as continuing and completing, that renewal which had already taken place, they ought to "give all diligence," in the use of every appointed means, from an earnest desire of increasing holiness; and thus "to add to their faith, virtue," that they might, with fortitude and manly constancy, profess faith in Christ, and obey his will, in the midst of persecutors: and display firmness and composure of mind, notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers to which they were exposed. They ought, furthermore, diligently "to add to their virtue, knowledge;" that, by an increasing acquaintance with the whole truth and will of God, they might be enabled to regulate their zeal and courage, with judgment and discretion: knowing how to behave in all circumstances, and towards all men; like well-informed intelligent persons, who could not justly be charged with any thing rash, foolish, or contrary to the duty and propriety of their relations and station, in the church or the community. (Note, Phil. 1:9—11.) To "knowledge" they must add "temperance," or an exact government of all the animal appetites, in subordination to the will of God, and the benefit of themselves and others; as well as great moderation in all worldly things, and indifference about them. To "temperance" they must unite "patience," or a cheerful submission to the will of God under afflictions, meekness amidst injuries and affronts, perseverance in well-doing notwithstanding severe trials, and a quiet waiting for the Lord, to interpose for their comfort and deliverance. To this "godliness" must be added; as consisting of all those holy affections and dispositions, which constitute the spiritual worshipper and truly devoted servant of God, "in all his ordinances and commandments:" (1 Tim. 4:6—10. 6:6—10.) and to this, "brotherly kindness," or an unfeigned fervent love of Christians, as brethren in the Lord. (Notes, Heb. 13:1—3. 1 Pet. 1:22—25.) To all the rest they must join "charity," or benevolent and compassionate love to all men, expansive and universal philanthropy, or "good-will to men," according to the commandments of God, and in imitation of his kindness to our fallen race. (Notes, Luke 2:8—14. Tit. 3:4—7.) These holy dispositions, and the effects of them upon their conduct, must be diligently and carefully added together, as different voices in harmony form a chorus: that so, the exercise of each other might regulate, and bound, and unite with that of the rest, and prevent their exceeding or degenerating. Thus, the Christian character would appear well proportioned, and beautiful: whereas, if any of these graces were remarkably defective, the others would appear to be redundant; being joined with those natural dispositions, which most resembled them: and the character would appear deformed and destitute of symmetry; whilst one man would be bold without knowledge or love; another, gentle and kind, without firmness or fortitude. The same disproportion would appear in various other particulars.—It is evident, that none of the genuine graces of the Christian character can exist alone: all combine in forming it: but symmetry is the source of beauty. (Notes Matt. 5:3. Gal. 5:22—26.)

V. 8, 9. These things ought to be peculiarly attended to as the usefulness and comfort of Christians greatly depended upon them. For if holy affections and dispositions were rooted in their hearts, and "abounded" in their lives, these would effectually prevent them from being "slothful or unfruitful in their knowledge of Christ:" as they would excite them to continual activity in his service; and to that behaviour in all relative duties, and in the improvement of their talents, which would be very useful to mankind. (Notes, Heb. 6: 9—12.) But, on the other hand, the professed Christian, who was destitute of these holy dispositions, was to be considered as spiritually "blind:" for his most exact notions only showed, that he had heard that such things were: but his conduct proved that he had never seen or understood the real nature, use, glory, and excellency of them. At least, if greatly deficient in them, he must be very "short-sighted," and incapable of perceiving any thing of the genuine tendency of the gospel: nay, he had forgotten the very meaning of his own profession, when he embraced Christianity, and was baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus; as baptism represented the purging away of a man's old sins, in conformity to the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, that, being dead unto sin, and risen to newness of life, he might thenceforth live unto God. (Notes, Rom. 6:1—11. 1 Pet. 3:21,22. 4:1,2.)

profit men, without the renewal of their hearts to holiness: the apostle therefore exhorted his brethren, "the rather to give diligence, to make their calling and election sure;" that by earnestly and vigorously using every means of grace, applying themselves to the performance of all their various duties, mortifying every sinful propensity, and cultivating every holy affection; the evidence of their "calling," or regeneration and conversion, might become complete, clear, and indisputable to themselves, as well as to others. (Note, 1 John 2:3—6.) And by this, their "election" would also be ascertained; and they might assuredly infer, that "God had from the beginning chosen them to salvation," and would "preserve them to his eternal glory." (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. Eph. 1:1—12. 1 Thes. 1:1—4. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. 2 Tim. 1:9,10. Tit. 1:1—4. Heb. 6:11,12. 1 Pet. 1:1—5.) For if they diligently practised those things which had been mentioned, they should "never fall;" it would thus be manifest that they were true believers, who would be preserved from total and final apostacy, into which many professed Christians were drawn: and, in proportion to their diligence, they would be kept from the snares of Satan, and from falling into such sins, as would be a scandal to the gospel, and very distressing to themselves. Thus they would be preserved in a comfortable and honourable walk with God, and from all those declensions and failures, into which others were betrayed: and when they left the world, "an entrance would be granted to them into the everlasting kingdom of Christ;" every thing would be so arranged as to conduce to their felicity; they would be favoured at the approach of death, with satisfactory assurance that they were going to heaven; they would enter that blessed estate, as a ship comes into harbour, richly laden from a prosperous voyage, with a fair gale and a full tide carrying it above all impediments, and terminating all its dangers; and those who were left behind would have no doubt of their being gone to be with Christ, in his glorious and eternal kingdom. (Note, Heb. 4:1,2.) Whereas inconsistent professors of the gospel would probably have darkness and doubt for their companions in the hour of death; others would be disposed to hesitate in respect of the event; and in many ways they must suffer loss, even though they were "saved as by fire." (Notes, Rom. 8:14—17. 2 Cor. 1:12—14.) V. 12—15. Seeing things were as it had been stated, the apostle assured his brethren, that he would not be negligent in his duty, but would embrace every opportunity of "putting them in remembrance" of these important matters: even "though they knew them, and were established," especially in that truth which he then inculcated; namely, the necessity of diligence and holiness, in order to assurance of their "calling and election," and to "an abundant entrance into the eternal kingdom of Christ." (Note, 3:1—4.) This was the case with many, who would be glad to have their memories refreshed, and their holy affections invigorated, by his animated exhortations: but others might be in a declining or wavering frame of mind; especially as many teachers propagated opinions of a contrary tendency. The apostle, however, deemed it "meet," right, and a debt owing to his brethren, so long as he sojourned in the frail body, as in a tabernacle, (Note, 2 Cor. 5:1—4.) to stir them up to increasing and persevering diligence in every good work; by putting them in remembrance of those truths, which they had before learned, but were too apt to forget. To this he was excited by the assurance that his death speedily approached; (Preface to Deut. Note, Deut. 33:1. Josh. 23:24: 1 Chr. 29: John 13:—17: 2 Tim. 4:1—8.) when his body would be taken down like a tent; or laid aside as a garment, by one who was going to rest; not indeed by a natural dissolution, but by a violent death, as his beloved Lord had showed him long before. (Note, John 21:18—23.)—The composure with which Peter on this occasion spoke of the excruciating death which awaited him, as if it had been no more than putting off his garment, or removing his tent, may very properly be contrasted with his terror, and denial of his Lord, when he had been left to himself in order to his humiliation. (Notes, Matt. 26:30—35,69—75.)—Until the very time of his death should arrive, it would be his chief concern and endeavour, to use every means, that each individual might after his decease have these practical instructions in remembrance.—Though he wrote to the churches in Asia, yet he evidently intended his exhortations for the benefit of Christians in other ages and nations: and we still have his words "in our remembrance." (Note, John 15:12—16. P. O. 9—16.)—The insufficiency of oral tradition is clearly shown by the apostle's earnestness to convey his admonitions in writing.

V. 16—18. The apostle was prepared to lay down his life in attestation to the gospel, and earnest to establish others in the faith; because he was conscious and confident, that he, and other ministers of Christ, had not followed artful and ingenious "fables, cunningly devised" for the purpose of soothing men's passions, and gratifying their depraved inclinations; and thus advancing the persons who propagated them, to wealth, authority, or reputation. This had been the nature, intention, and effect of many of the Pagan fictions, and the inventions of Jewish rabbies: and indeed this, in one way or other, is the object of all those who invent and propagate false or perverted systems of religion. But there was nothing of this nature in the doctrine taught by the apostles, concerning the power and authority to which Christ had been advanced in consequence of his crucifixion and resurrection, and the ends for which he reigned; or in what related to his "second coming to judge the world," to perfect the salvation of his disciples, and to excute vengeance on his enemies. These doctrines were not suited to please carnal men, or to procure secular advantages to those who taught them: indeed such instructions would certainly offend those who were not brought to repentance, faith, and holiness; but they were authenticated in the most satisfactory manner. For Peter, with James and John, had been eyewitnesses of their Lord's "majesty," even during the season appointed for his humiliation. His essential dignity, and his approaching mediatorial exaltation, were manifest in the splendour of his countenance; and in the appearance of Moses and Elias, to surrender up their honours to him, at his transfiguration. But especially, he received the most distinguishing honour and glory from "God the Father;" when there was heard from the bright cloud, the symbol of the divine Presence in transcendent glory, a voice saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased:" and the apostle himself, together with his brethren, had "heard this voice from heaven," when he accompanied the Lord Jesus to the mount of transfiguration; which was properly called "holy," from this signal display of the divine majesty upon it. (Notes, Ex. 3:4,5. Matt. 3:16,17. 17:1—8.)

V. 19. The recollection of the transfiguration of Christ, gave great confidence personally to the apostle, which was indeed especially intended; and his testimony concerning it might be a great confirmation of the faith of other Christians: yet, they had also "a more sure word of prophecy." The appearance and voice on the mount were transient, and only three persons witnessed the interesting scene; one of whom had long before been martyred. (Note, Acts 12:1—4.) Whatever assurance, therefore, it might bring to the individuals concerned; it was not so well suited fully to satisfy the minds of men in general, as the prophecies of Scripture were. These, from the beginning, at least from Adam's fall, (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) had foretold and described one extraordinary Person; and given intimations of his birth, character, miracles, doctrines, sufferings, death, resurrection, and exaltation; together with the establishment, extent, prosperity, and duration of his kingdom, and his final coming to judgment. And when they were compared with the accomplishment of them in Jesus of Nazareth, they constituted a permanent and general proof, unanswerably conclusive, that he was "the Messiah," "the Son of God," and "the Saviour of the world." Thus the prophecies more powerfully corroborated the doctrine of the apostles, concerning his exaltation and second coming, than any thing which Peter had seen on the mount could do: not indeed to him personally, or to James and John, who witnessed the transfiguration; but to men in general. So that the more "this word of prophecy" should be considered, the fuller conviction would it communicate. To this, therefore, all who read the epistle would "do well" to give peculiar attention: for it was to be considered "as a light shining in a dark place," not only in respect of the total ignorance of the Gentiles, and the comparative darkness of the Mosaic economy; but as the earth has been at all times a dark place, except where the word of God has diffused light in it, by leading men to Christ, "the Light of the world." (Notes, Is. 8:20. 60:1—3. Matt. 4:12—17. Luke 1:76—79. John 1:4—9. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.) Christians ought therefore to attend to the prophecies of Scripture, for their direction and conviction, concerning the truth of the Christian religion; till the Holy Spirit should discover to their souls the glory and excellency of the gospel, and, by his sanctifying and comfortable influences, give them "the dawning" of heaven in their hearts; and, till the knowledge of Christ, and the experience of his power, truth, and love, had formed within them an assurance, and anticipation of the light, holiness, and felicity of the saints, in the presence of their glorified Saviour; even as the morning star preceded and ushered in the rising sun and "the perfect day." (Notes, Prov. 4:18,19. Hos. 6:1—3. 2 Cor. 1:21,22. 4:5,6.) Nothing can be more manifest, than that the "day-dawn and daystar arise in the hearts" of true Christians; and that no external, or what is not improperly called internal evidence of the divine original of Christianity, is meant. The internal evidence of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures signifies the evidence of divinity which they contain in themselves: but "the day-dawn, and daystar in our hearts" must mean what is internal in our own experience; "the secret of the LORD, which is with them that fear him." (Notes, Ps. 25:14. 63:5—8. John 14:18—24. Rev. 2:17.) The unnatural and far-fetched interpretations of those who oppose this conclusion, serve only to confirm the author in his judgment.—This inward demonstration of the truth of Christianity would render the external evidence less necessary to those who enjoyed it: as they could no longer doubt of it, when they saw the glory, and tasted the comfort of it, and experienced the truth and power of it in their hearts, and manifested it in their conduct. (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.)

V. 20, 21. In "taking heed to this light," Christians must first "know," as a matter of the greatest importance, that "no prophecy of Scripture is of any private interpretation."—This clause has been variously explained. Some render it, 'of any private impulse,' as if it related rather to the giving, than the interpreting of prophecy: but the word cannot properly be so rendered, as it implies the loosing of a knot: and it would also render the next verse a mere repetition of the same thought; and that in the form of a reason assigned for what went before, which is very unnatural.—Many have opposed the text to the right of private judgment, in order to support a supposed authority inherent, somewhere, in the church and its ministers; and to make them the ultimate object of faith, by fixing the sense of the Scriptures for the people: yet, at last, this is as much private interpretation as any other can be; for every church and its ministers put their own meaning upon the word of God, and that often contrary to the truth. Some have referred the words to the general application of scriptural promises by believers to their own case; as being a common property of the church, and not the appropriate exclusive right of the individuals to whom they were at first given. But the apostle was not discoursing of promises; as his argument relates entirely to predictions: and this indeed seems to point out the true meaning. The lively imaginations and inventive genius of men often lead them to suppose events to be accomplishments of scriptural prophecies, which in fact have no direct relation to them: and this way of misapplying them, as fancy, inclination, system, or external transient appearances may dictate, has always tended to render prophecies suspected or disregarded. Instead then of employing a lively imagination or superior genius, to discover some agreement between our own private concerns, or those of our party, or the events of the day, and the predictions of Scripture; and so attempting to foretell future events from them; we should remember, and be assured, that every prophecy has its precise and determinate meaning, which no human ingenuity can alter. We ought therefore to exercise our judgment, with proper help, and in dependence on divine teaching, to discover, as far as we can, the real meaning of the predictions, and the accomplishment of them in the public concerns of Christ and his church, and in those of the world as connected with the church: and to rest satisfied with understanding such as have evidently been fulfilled; without too curiously prying into those which appear to be hitherto unaccomplished. Thus the perversion of prophecy would be prevented, and the objections against the argument brought from it, in proof of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, would be fully obviated. The prophecies, which have been already most evidently fulfilled, in the Person and salvation of Christ, and in the grand concerns of the church and of the world, form a most unanswerable demonstration of the truth of Christianity; and the accumulating evidence, arising from the fulfilment of further prophecies, from age to age, must at last rouse the attention of the most heedless, and silence the cavils of the most skeptical. But the misapplication of prophecy, as if it were "of private interpretation;" and as if every man were at liberty to put his own fanciful meaning upon it, only serves to furnish objections, gives the whole an air of uncertainty, and so exceedingly perplexes the subject.—For "the prophecy came not in ancient times," at the instance and according to the inclinations of men, nor can it be properly thus interpreted: but the events, to which it related, were fixed in the eternal counsels of God, to be accomplished in their appointed season. "Holy men of God," who served him, and were specially favoured by him, "spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit;" and they were so far from modelling their predictions according to their inclinations, that they frequently could not discover the meaning of their own words. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)—The author has lately been led to consider Bishop Horsley's view of this subject: but he can only say, that it has not in the least made him doubt of the truth of the interpretation above given.—The apostle intended the prophecies of the Old Testament; but his arguments are equally conclusive respecting those of the New Testament also: and the close is a most decisive attestation to the divine inspiration of the Scriptures.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. We should carefully examine, whether our faith be of a "like precious" nature and efficacy, with that of the primitive servants of Jesus Christ: for if we have "obtained" this inestimable benefit, we are certainly interested in "the righteousness of our God and Saviour;" and "grace and peace will be multiplied unto us," in proportion to "our knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord," till the whole is perfected in the felicity of heaven. We can expect nothing too great and valuable from him, whose "divine power hath already given us all things pertaining to life and godliness; through the knowledge of him who hath called us" by his new creating Spirit, in order to bring us to his "everlasting glory." "Exceedingly great and precious promises" are contained in his holy word; so that if we have the "precious faith," which embraces and relies on the promises, and which renders Christ precious to the soul; we possess all that is essentially valuable; and need not desire those trifles which carnal men idolize, as if they comprised the substance of all happiness. But let us remember, that these promises were given to us, in order to our being "partakers of a divine nature;" and this will induce us to inquire, whether we really "flee from the pollutions which are in the world, through the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life;" and whether we be really "renewed in the spirit of our minds." It will also teach us to convert all these promises into prayers, for the purifying and transforming grace of the Holy Spirit, to make us indeed partakers, more and more, of the image of God in righteousness, goodness, and truth.

V. 5—11. It is incumbent on us to "give all diligence, to add to our faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity;" that it may appear that we are one with Christ, and with the Father through him. (Notes, John 17:20—23.) When these graces dwell in the heart, and abound in the conduct, they constitute a consistent, active, and fruitful Christian: and a degree of zeal and diligence in "good works," to which other men are strangers, will show the excellency of those doctrines, which many ignorantly suppose to lead to licentiousness. But "the light which is in" numbers, even of those who profess the gospel, "is darkness:" (Notes, Matt. 6:22,23. Tit. 1:14—16.) and, while they boast themselves to be more clearsighted than

CHAPTER II.

The apostle foretells the coming of false teachers; showing in general their corrupt principles and selfishness, and the fatal effects of their influence, 1—3. He adduces the severity of God in punishing apostate angels, the inhabitants of the old world, and those of Sodom, with his kindness to Noah and Lot, in proof that he would certainly preserve his people, and execute vengeance on the wicked, 4—9. A more particular account of the seducers above mentioned, of their vile character and practices, and of the hopeless condition of many, who were deceived by them, 10—22.

BUT [a]there were false prophets also among the people, [b]even as there shall be false teachers among you, who [c]privily shall bring in [d]damnable heresies, even [e]denying the Lord that [f]bought them, [g]and bring upon themselves swift destruction.

2 And [h]many shall follow their [i]pernicious ways; [j]by reason of whom the [k]way of truth shall be [l]evil spoken of.

3 And [m]through covetousness shall they [n]with feigned words [o]make merchandise of you: [p]whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not.

practical Christians and teachers, their own deficiency, in the graces and good works of true religion, proves them to be "blind," or at least very dim-sighted; men who can see nothing, but a few things belonging to their own narrow system, without perceiving the enlarged nature and beneficent tendency of the gospel; who have forgotten, that even baptism signifies 'a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness;' and that Christians, by their very profession, are bound 'to mortify all evil and corrupt affections, and daily to proceed in all virtue and godliness of living.' As, therefore, so many "are pure in their own eyes, who are not washed from their filthiness;" (Notes, Prov. 14:12. 16:2. 30:11—14.) and as every one of Christ's apostles bears most decided testimony against such a worthless form of knowledge, such a dead and solitary faith; (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6,13—18. 6:6—10. Jam. 2:19—26. 1 John 3:7—10. Jude 3,8.) "we ought the rather to give diligence to make our calling and election sure." Many indeed presume themselves to be elect, because they believe the doctrine of election, according to their notions on that subject; though they have no evidence, that "God hath called them with a holy calling:" but, if we would not be deceived, we must diligently make sure to our souls, by the indisputable fruits of the Spirit, that we are called by regenerating and renewing grace; and we may thence safely infer our eternal election, and our final preservation. It is not said, that if we hold certain doctrines, we shall never fall; but "if we do these things, we shall never fall:" and, in the diligent and persevering practice of every good work, we should wait for "an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

V. 12—18. It behooves all ministers, after the example of Peter, diligently and at all times to put their readers "in remembrance of the things" above mentioned, in connexion with evangelical truth: otherwise they cannot "take them to record, that they are pure from their blood, having declared unto them all the counsel of God," however exactly they have preached the doctrines of grace. (Notes, Acts 20:18—27.) This is not only necessary, with such as are ignorant or waver in these matters; but even among those "who know them, and are," as to their judgment, "established" in them: for allowed truths often lie dormant in the mind, except as they are rendered active by animated exhortations: and a carnal mind renders the memory treacherous in this respect, so that it soon loses sight of spiritual instructions. (Notes, Prov. 2:1—8. Matt. 13:18,19. Heb. 3:1—6.) These practical subjects, however, do not always prove most acceptable to the majority, in congregations where the doctrines of grace are preached: so that ministers will often be tempted to omit them, or to hurry them over, in a general and superficial manner, which exceedingly tends to deceive souls, and to diffuse a false and loose religion. We are therefore bound in justice to men, as well as in duty to God, "as long as we are in these tabernacles," to "stir up" our people, and all to whom we have access, "by putting them in remembrance" of the various good works, by which they must glorify God and adorn the gospel; and to consult what is profitable, rather than what is pleasant to them. For "we shall shortly put off these our tabernacles:" and, when we are advanced in years, feel the infirmities of decaying nature, and have outlived most of our contemporaries, we do not need any revelation to assure us that this is even now at hand. Yet at this period, the age and influence of a consistent minister often give him peculiar advantages for usefulness. These should be improved with alacrity, promptitude, and self-denying earnestness, as there "is no work, nor wisdom, in the grave whither we are going:" (Notes, Ec. 9:10. John 9:4—7. Col. 3:16,17.) after the example of Moses, Joshua, David, the apostle Peter, his "well beloved brother Paul," and even the Lord Jesus himself; and not according to the custom of too many, who relax their diligence at the very time when it would be most impressive, and the greatest blessing might be expected. Yet nothing can tend so much to produce composure in the prospect or in the pangs of death, and in expectation of our great account, as consciousness that we have not sought to please men, or to obtain wealth, reputation, ease, or indulgence to ourselves; but that we have faithfully and simply and perseveringly served the Lord Jesus Christ, and sought his glory, and the salvation of souls, as the great aim of all our labours. Indeed the speedy approach of death should excite us, not only to prepare to meet it with comfort; but to use every proper means, that all around us may have the substance of our instructions in remembrance after our decease. Nor are ministers alone concerned in this: parents, tutors, school masters, even to the teachers of charity schools and Sunday schools, have an important opportunity of usefulness in these respects; and an awful responsibility attached to their several employments. We cannot indeed expect such extensive and permanent success, to our feeble and defective endeavours, as has crowned the writings of inspired men of God: yet, when we are conscious that our testimony tends to lead men to the Scriptures, to Christ, and to holiness, we may hope that abiding good will spring from them: whilst many of the admired productions of ingenious infidels, heretics, and ungodly men, will continue to corrupt the principles, to deprave the morals, and to murder the souls of numbers, from age to age; to the accumulating guilt and condemnation of those, who left so fatal a bequest to posterity. For whatever clamours may be raised about bigotry and uncharitableness; it is most certain, that they only, who preach salvation for sinners through Jesus Christ, and who make "known his power and coming to judge the world," are free from the charge of following cunningly devised fables; and therefore they ought to be the most earnest in their labours, without regarding what the consequence may be respecting their temporal interests. For even those things, of which the apostles, or some of them, were eyewitnesses, concerning the majesty and glory of Christ; and what they "heard from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" are full of conviction, instruction, and encouragement to us, at this day, to direct and animate us in the work of the Lord.

V. 19—21. We have not seen or heard such things as the apostles did: but "we have a more sure word of prophecy," which will fully satisfy the diligent investigator, even more than any transient miracle could do; as it lies open to every man's examination, and continually becomes more conclusive, by the further accomplishment of its predictions. To this grand evidence of the truth of Christianity, and its great doctrines, every serious inquirer will "do well to take heed;" especially in this skeptical age, when so many engines are at work, to draw the attention of the unestablished from the gospel, as if it were "a cunningly devised fable." In this way then, let such persons wait, and, taking heed to this "light that shineth in a dark place," they will gradually be directed to Christ; and their experience of his power, truth, and love, will be "the day-dawn, and the daystar arising in their hearts," and a sure earnest and foretaste of everlasting happiness.—But, "in searching the Scriptures," and especially in considering the prophecies and their accomplishment, we should beware of self-confidence, party prejudices, ungoverned fancy, and the influence of selfish passions. We have indeed a right to judge for ourselves, and should call no man master on earth: but it is requisite we should exercise our judgment with sobriety, modesty, and docility: nor is it generally safe to indulge a fondness for novelty, or to deviate from the approved judgment of eminent servants of God, in other ages of the church, without evident necessity. Above all, we should examine these subjects with earnest prayer for the teaching of the same Spirit, by whom "holy men of God spake" their prophecies; that we may be enabled to discover what was his meaning in them, as far as that is good for us. Under his guidance, we shall be kept from interpreting Scripture according to our private fancy, humour, or inclination; we shall discover the relation, nearer or more remote, of all the prophecies to Christ and his church. We shall also perceive that so many of them have already been fulfilled, that we are fully authorized to expect the accomplishment of all the rest; till his second coming to judge the world, to perfect his people's salvation, and to shut up the wicked in hell, shall fulfil the last of these predictions, to the glory of his truth, power, love, wisdom, and righteousness, and the joy and admiration of all his redeemed people, in the sight of the whole assembled world of angels and men.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—3. (Note, 1:20,21.) The false prophets opposed "the holy men of God," under the old dispensation; and, by flattering and deceitful words, obtained a pernicious ascendency over the minds of the people, and the rulers of Israel: (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 1 Kings 22:10—28. Is. 9:13—17. Jer. 5:30,31. 14:13—16. 23:9—40. 27:—29: Ez. 14:) and there would, in like manner, be "false teachers" in the Christian church, who, by similar methods, would draw off professed Christians from the holy doctrine of the apostles, and other faithful preachers. These deceivers would not at once openly and directly, but privily, oppose the leading truths of Christianity: they would work with unsuspected subtlety; and by degrees, under specious pretences, clandestinely introduce such false doctrines, as tended to subvert the very design of the gospel. (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:13—15. Gal. 2:1—5.) These heresies would make grievous divisions in the church, and end in the "swift destruction" of those who were deceived by them, and of the deceivers especially. For they would "deny the Lord that bought them." Men, professing to believe that the Lord Jesus "redeemed the church with his own blood," (Notes, Acts 20:28. Gal. 3:6—14.) and considering themselves "as bought with" that inestimable "price;" instead of glorfying him by devoted obedience, would cast off his yoke, renounce his authority, and refuse to "have him to reign over them."—It is not requisite to understand the apostle, as declaring, that the Lord Jesus had died, with an express intention of redeeming these very persons: it sufficed for his argument, that they denied him, as their Lord, in whom they professed to hope as a Redeemer; as all avowed Antinomians do. Thus Christ sometimes addressed the Pharisees according to their own mistaken notions, and argued with them from their own principles. (Notes, Luke 15:3—7, 25—32.)—The inconsistency and base conduct of these false teachers was evident from their own profession; and it was not the manner of the sacred writers to express themselves with that systematic exactness, which many now affect. (Notes, Rom. 14:13—23. 1 Cor. 8:7—13.)—It appears very unnatural to explain the words "the Lord that bought them," of Israel's redemption from Egypt, which would never have been thought of, in this connexion, had not controversy led men to exercise their utmost ingenuity, to evade the arguments, and answer the objections of their opponents. Thus attachment to a system leads men to do violence to the Scriptures, and this deeply injures the cause which they are so anxious to defend. Doubtless Christ intended to redeem those, and those only, who, he foresaw, would eventually be saved by faith in him: yet his ransom was of infinite sufficiency, the proposal of it in Scripture is general, and men are continually addressed, according to their profession, even when it is intimated that they are not upright in it. (1:9.)—The false teachers, by denying, or refusing to obey him as their Lord and King, whom they professed to trust in as their Redeemer, and by teaching others their abominable doctrines, were "bringing on themselves swift destruction," which would come on them unawares and suddenly. But, in the mean time, many would "follow their pernicious ways," or destructions; imbibing their poisonous principles, and copying their base examples; "by reason of whom the way of truth would be blasphemed" by ignorant persons, who would conclude that Christians in general held these licentious doctrines, and that they secretly indulged themselves in wickedness, though only some of them were detected, or were bold enough to avow it. In this manner, by flattery, and false pretences to love, zeal, and attachment to evangelical doctrines, they would pay court to men's passions and carnal inclinations in order to gratify their own avarice; and so they would carry on a base merchandise for the souls of the people, consigning them to destruction in order to enrich themselves. (Notes, and P. O. Is. 56:9—12. Notes, Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Cor. 11:16—20. Phil. 2:17- 19. 6:6—10. 1 Tim. 3:1—5. Tit. 1:10—13. Rev. 18:11—19. P. O. 9—19.) But, whilst they thus prospered by their "damnable heresies," and hoped for impunity in their crimes; the punishment intended for them had long before been predicted; the place of torment had been of old prepared; the judgment by which they would be condemned did not linger, and the vengeance of God, which would certainly consign them to eternal destruction, did by no means "slumber." Indeed, the Lord bore with them in his longsuffering, till his own holy purposes should be effected, and their measure of iniquity filled up: and they inferred, that the predicted "judgment lingered," and the threatened "damnation slumbered;" but the event would soon awfully undeceive them. (Note, 3:1—4.)—Learned men have maintained discordant opinions, concerning the heretics whom the apostle especially intended: but probably he used general language designedly, that the description might suit various kinds of false teachers, in that and in all future ages.

V. 4—9. The method in which the Lord proceeded in such cases, might evidently be collected from past examples. When angels, who were created of a far superior order to men, sinned against God; he showed them no mercy, and exercised no compassion towards them: but, on the first instance of their rebellion, "he cast them down," as guilty and polluted, from his holy habitation in heaven; and allotted them their residence and portion in "hell," even in that place of torment, which his righteous vengeance had prepared for them, and their great ringleader in rebellion. (Matt. 25:41.) Thus they were bound as criminals, and reserved to take their trial at the day of judgment; when sentence will be openly passed, and finally executed upon them. (Notes, Rev. 20:1—3,7—10.) In the mean time their incurable enmity and wickedness, and the omnipresent and omnipotent justice of God, hold them fast, as "in chains of darkness," misery and despair, from which there can be no possible escape. Their doom is therefore irreversible: though the Lord, for wise reasons, lengthens their chains, enlarges the bounds of their prison, and defers the extremity of their punishment; which respite and relaxation they employ, in opposing to the uttermost his purposes of love to mankind, and in attempting their destruction. (Notes, Gen. 3:1—6,14,15. Job 1:6—11. 2:1—5. Zech. 3:1—4. John 8:41—47. 2 Cor. 4:3,4. Rev. 12:7—12.) But this will all be overruled for the fuller display of the glory of God, the accomplishment of his eternal counsels, and the more conspicuous exercise of his awful justice, in the everlasting misery of these implacable enemies.—Thus he would also bear with the false teachers above mentioned, till their impiety and enmity were sufficiently evinced: and when his wise and holy purposes were accomplished, he would execute deserved vengeance upon them and their adherents; and so terminate the temptation to which his people were exposed through their artifices. (Note, 2 Tim. 3:6—9.)—The same instructions might be deduced from the Lord's dealings with the old world. He had indeed preserved "Noah, the eighth person;" (seven others having been saved with him, for his sake, in the ark which he had prepared;) and during the hundred and twenty years of his long-suffering, Noah had been "a preacher of righteousness" to that corrupt generation among whom he lived, which must have exposed him to manifold trials and temptations; as none, that we know of, were brought to repentance, faith in the promised Saviour, and obedience to God, by his long-continued labours. So that, at length, the Lord executed the vengeance denounced, and spared none of all the millions who then lived on earth: but by bringing in the deluge he destroyed them all; "and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark." (Notes, Gen. 6: 7. Ez. 14:13—20. Heb. 11:7. 1 Pet. 3:19,20.)—In like manner, the Lord, after having long borne with the extreme wickedness of Sodom, till their measure of sin was filled up; at length, when they did not at all expect it, sent fire from heaven to burn their cities and all the inhabitants of them; that the tremendous overthrow, to which they were condemned, might be a solemn warning and an instructive "example to all" those in future ages, who should live in ungodliness and wickedness. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Gen. 19:) Yet at the same time the Lord delivered, in a most gracious and wonderful manner, "righteous Lot," from the destruction of his neighbours. For though he had been very faulty in many respects, and was severely corrected; yet, being a true believer and a justified servant of God, he was taken care of, and brought out of Sodom before it was destroyed. He had indeed, from carnal motives, gone to reside in that wicked place, and had very pertinaciously adhered to the foolish choice which he had made; (Notes, Gen. 13:14:) but he was extremely uneasy there, being continually "vexed and harassed" by the filthy conduct and discourse of the abandoned Sodomites, and their clamorous and furious opposition to his counsels and instructions. What he saw and heard of their unlawful and hateful crimes, caused his "righteous soul" daily vexation and inquietude; seeing he could not prevail in any degree to stop the inundation of their wickedness. But this disposition to hate, avoid, and be troubled for the sins of his neighbours, joined to his general conduct, proved him to be a pious man: and therefore, whilst he was stripped of his possessions, as a correction for his sin, and his family was either destroyed, or greatly corrupted and disgraced by means of it; the Lord mercifully "snatched him as a brand out of the burning," and saved him from so perilous and ensnaring a situation. These examples, therefore, sufficiently showed that the "Lord knew how," in the best time and manner, to "deliver the godly out of temptation," to rescue them from the most formidable dangers, in a critical moment; to distinguish the most feeble and defective of them, from their ungodly neighbours; and to arrange all his dispensations in the best manner for their salvation. This he has engaged to do; and his wisdom must be trusted, to select the best time and manner of performing his faithful promises, which cannot fail, whatever appearances may be. But he also "knows how to reserve the unrighteous to the day of judgment to be punished:" whilst he bears with them, and permits them to prosper in vice, they are bound, as it were, in 'the chains of their sins,' and shut up in the dungeon of his immutable justice, till "the day of his wrath;" when he will bring them forth to judgment, and execute on them the most terrible punishment, because of his long patience with them, and their perverse abuse of it. V. 10, 11. The preceding observations were applicable to all wicked men; but especially to hypocritical and heretical professors and teachers of Christianity: yet they were, and would be, peculiarly verified in the licentious heresiarchs, of whom the apostle treated, and in that of their abandoned followers. These habitually "walked after the flesh," and indulged their sensual appetites "in the lust of uncleanness;" as if they had proposed to themselves the inhabitants of Sodom for an example: and while they exercised no government over their own passions and inclinations, they "despised the government" of others. They denied Christ, in respect of his kingly office, and would not obey him as their Lord and Master; (Note, 1—3.) and we may suppose, that they contemptuously disregarded the spiritual authority of the apostles, and other pastors and rulers of the church. (Notes, 1 John 4:4—6. 3 John 9—12.) They seem also to have treated civil government with scorn, as if they were determined, like genuine "sons of Belial," to cast off every yoke, and to be wholly their own masters! For they were "presumptuous," self-confident, destitute of any due regard to God, aspiring to pre-eminence, and supposing themselves authorized to do whatever they chose. They were "self-willed," determined to follow the impulse of their own mind; proudly set against counsel, not to be influenced by argument, disregarding all consequences, and bent upon their own rash and foolish purposes. manner; and, instead of honouring the persons and authority of those in exalted stations, according to the word of God, and as his ministers and representatives; they calumniated and railed at them, without fear of consequences: and doing these things under the pretence of religion, they exposed Christianity to scandal, and gave plausibility to the accusations and persecutions of their enemies. (Notes, Rom. 13:1—7. Tit. 2:1,2. 1 Pet. 2:13—17.)—But angels, who were far greater and more powerful than men, and perfect in holiness, did not act thus in respect of the governors of the earth: for, though, as ministers of Providence, they reported to the Lord the execution of their commission, with respect even to kings and rulers; they did not bring any virulent or bitter accusations against them; but stated facts as they were, and respected them as God's vicegerents: though they could not but abhor the crimes which they often witnessed, and sometimes were employed to punish. So that the professors of Christianity, who slandered and reviled "dignities," did not copy the example of holy angels, but rather that of Satan, the false accuser of men in the presence of God. V. 12—14. The heretics, here described, were like "natural brute beasts," which, being bent on the gratification of their appetites, rage against all who oppose them, and are ready to devour them. And as savage beasts seem created only "to be taken and destroyed," to prevent the havoc which they might otherwise make of the human species; so these seducers would certainly expose themselves to destruction; nay, they would be proscribed as nuisances, and enemies to the community. Satan had caught them with his baits, and "taken them captive at his will;" (Note, 2 Tim. 2:23—26.) and they were in the way to eternal destruction. For, being impatient of counsel or control, they uttered vehement revilings against the persons, authority, laws, and measures of their rulers, which they were incompetent to understand, or had never sufficiently examined; and in so doing, they incurred both the displeasure of princes, and the wrath of God also; and thus would utterly perish by their own corrupt practices. For, notwithstanding their vain conceit of imagined privileges, they would certainly "receive the reward of unrighteousness:" seeing their pleasure was not sought in obeying God, but in riotous feastings and intemperance, in which they indulged, even during the light of the day, without shame or remorse. (Note, 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) They were, therefore, "spots and blemishes," who deformed and disgraced those Christian societies, which did not expel them, whilst they wantonly sported themselves, and indulged a kind of insulting triumph, "in their own deceivings;" as if they were the chief favourites of heaven, and persons uncommonly illuminated in the grace and liberty of the gospel: when in fact they were not believers at all, and were thus boasting and exulting on the brink of destruction. So that, while they partook with Christians of the Lord's supper, or joined in the religious feasts, in which the rich and poor ate together in a loving manner; their conduct was so shameful, that they reflected scandal on the whole company with which they associated. For, besides their riot, luxury, and excess, "their eyes were full of adultery," or "of an adulteress," as if their infamous paramours had never been out of their sight; so constantly were their imaginations and inclinations engaged about their habitual wicked practices! Nay, they "could not cease from sin;" not from external constraint, or natural inability; (which would have been an extenuation of their guilt:) but from the violence of their ungoverned passions, and the strength of their long-continued habits of vice; through which they were perfectly enslaved to their lusts, and indeed judicially given up to "a reprobate mind." But, notwithstanding all their wickedness, they pleaded so speciously and confidently for their corrupt principles, and so extenuated or apologized for their crimes: that they beguiled very many professed Christians, who were not established in knowledge, faith, grace, and experience. (Note, Rom. 16:17—20.) Thus they supported the expense of their sensual gratifications, by flattering and quieting men's consciences in the indulgence of their passions. For their hearts were exercised with covetous practices; and they constantly employed themselves in devising artful methods of obtaining money from their deluded followers, till inured to such base pursuits, they felt no remorse about them; which showed them to be "the children of a curse," and exposed to the wrath of God for their multiplied abominations. V. 15, 16. The false teachers and their disciples, who were described by the apostle, had evidently "forsaken the right way" of scriptural truth and holy obedience, and were gone astray; not merely from an erroneous judgment, but from the sensuality, ambition, and avarice of their hearts. Thus they followed the example of "Balaam, the son of Bosor," (or Beor,) who so "loved the wages of unrighteousness," that he endeavoured, in disobedience to the injunction of JEHOVAH, to go unto Balak, and curse the people whom God had blessed. But he was rebuked for his iniquity, not by the immediate voice of God, nor by one of his prophets; but by the ass on which he rode, which, though naturally "dumb," was miraculously enabled to speak; that by so despicable a creature, God might, in the most mortifying manner, forbid the prophet, who was very proud of his visions and revelations, to proceed in his infatuated course of rebellion. Yet he persevered; and when he could not prevail to curse Israel, he counselled Balak to seduce them into idolatry, that he might earn his unrighteous wages; and at length he perished in battle against Israel. (Num. 31:16. Notes, Num. 22:—25: 31:8. Rev. 2:14—16.)

V. 17. These teachers and their disciples were like "wells," from which men expected to draw water, but which could only disappoint their expectations: (Marg. Ref.) they were as clouds which gave hopes of fructifying rains; but, instead of yielding any advantage to others, they were themselves "carried about with" tempestuous winds. Thus the persons spoken of were driven about by their own passions and "by every wind of doctrine," from one false opinion to another. (Note, Eph. 4:14—16.) Indeed they were given up by God to final obduracy; as "the mist" the dimness, and dismay of darkness, or of wickedness, despair, and misery, was reserved for them as their everlasting portion.

V. 18, 19. These men were not only very wicked themselves, but the cause of sin and ruin to others.—While they "spake swelling" and pompous words, which had no meaning, except as they showed the vainglory and ostentation of their hearts; "they allured," by their confident boasting and specious pretensions, such professed Christians as were glad to suppose, that "the lusts of the flesh, and much wantonness" or lasciviousness, could consist with the salvation of the gospel: (Notes, Num. 24:16. P. O. 14—25. 25:1—3.) Thus they drew off those who had actually, as to their outward conduct, "escaped from those who lived in error," that is ignorant of Christianity, or avowedly rejecting it; but who abstained from their former indulgences only from fear, while their unrenewed hearts still hankered after them, not having been made "partakers of a divine nature." (Notes, 20—22. 1:3—5.) But whilst they paid court to the carnal minds hypocrites, by promising them liberty from every yoke, as if the service of God had not been the most 'perfect freedom;' they themselves were the "slaves of corruption," or of the most corrupt and base inclinations: as it was a general rule, that a man must become the bondservant of him by whom he was vanquished and taken captive. They were evidently vanquished, taken captive, and enslaved by the devil and their own lusts; and it was impossible that they could lead their followers into any better condition. (Notes, John 8:30—36. Rom 6:16—19.)

V. 20—22. If professed Christians having escaped the outward "pollution of the world, by the knowledge of Christ;" (Notes, 18,19. 1:3,4.) were again, by the artful seduction of false teachers, entangled in those polluting practices, as if consistent with the service of Christ, and so "overcome" as habitually to indulge in their corrupt inclinations; "their latter end," after they had learned thus to pervert the gospel, would be far worse than the beginning when they sinned in ignorance; as they must have done violence to far clearer light and fuller conviction. (Notes, Matt. 12:43—45. Luke 11:14—26. Heb. 10:26,27.) It would therefore have "been better" for such wretched heretics, hypocrites, or apostates, if they had "never known the way of righteousness," and the truths, promises, and precepts of Christianity; than after all their instructions, convictions, and profession, to "turn," in avowed disobedience, "from the holy commandment delivered unto them," to repent of their sins, to believe in Christ, and to love and obey him: as this would leave them more deeply condemned and completely hardened. But it was not to be wondered at, that teachers of this character made many proselytes; for it had "happened unto them according to the true proverb" of Solomon, (Note, Prov. 26:11.) and to another of similar import, the one of which has been explained, and the other is too obvious to need explanation.—They are the two most disgusting and loathsome emblems, which the whole animal race can suggest; and are adduced to illustrate the filthiness of those, who, after convictions, professed repentance, and outward reformation, return back to wickedness, because their carnal hearts loved it. But if the power of God should change the swine into a "sheep," (the emblem of the regenerate,) though it might be thrown into the mire, yet it could no longer "wallow in it" with delight, but must be most uncomfortable till cleansed from it.—They who "had escaped the pollutions of the world," had not been "made partakers of a divine nature;" nor had the nature of the dog or swine been changed: the swine was washed, but not made "a new creature."—The true Christian is born again, "new created to good works;" Christ dwells in him by his Spirit, and "makes all things new." (Notes, Matt. 12:29—32. Heb. 6:4—8. 10:26—39. 1 John 2:18,19. 5:14—18.)—The difference between this chapter and the other parts of Peter's epistles, in the style and manner, and its coincidence with that of Jude, have made several expositors suppose, that both of them borrowed their language from some ancient book which is now lost: but of this every reader must judge for himself.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—3. The unbelief, selfishness, and impiety of man's carnal heart, always give an opening to "false teachers, who "speak smooth things" "to draw away disciples after them," for their own credit or lucre's sake; and alas! how many thus "turn away their ears from the truth, and are turned unto fables," and liberally reward ingenious men for helping them to deceive themselves! Hence it has come to pass, both in Israel and in the Christian church, that men have arisen, who have found their account in corrupting the humbling, holy truth of God, by "privily bringing in damnable heresies;" who have denied and cast off obedience to the authority of the Lord, whilst they professed to glory in his special favour and abundant mercy; who have attempted to separate the redemption and the commandments of the Lord Jesus, and to expect pardon through his blood, whilst they yielded no obedience to his precepts! Thus they deceive themselves and others, and "bring upon themselves swift destruction." These specious refinements, while they seem to some persons the 'gospel of free grace,' in its full purity, are in fact "damnable heresies," which finally ruin all who "follow such pernicious ways;" and also cause the "way of truth to be evil spoken of." For many see the bad tendency and effects of these delusions; and charge them on all who

CHAPTER III.

The apostle reminds his brethren, of the promised coming of Christ; and predicts that scoffers will ridicule their expectation of that event, 1—4; being willingly ignorant of the truth in that respect, 5—7. He shows the reason of its being delayed, and the awful manner, circumstances, and consequences of it; with exhortations and encouragements to diligence and holiness, 8—14. He shows that "his beloved brother Paul" had taught them the same doctrine; commends his epistles; and shows how "ignorant and unstable men wrested" some parts of them, as they did "the other scriptures, to their own destruction," 15, 16; and concludes with warning the readers against seducers; and exhorting them to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Christ," 17, 18.

4 And saying, [k]Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were [l]from the beginning of the creation.

preach and profess the doctrines of salvation by grace alone, in the most scriptural manner, and in connexion with holy obedience. The sober teachers of practical and experimental Christianity need not be surprised to find their hearers drawn from them by plausible and soothing preachers; for even in the primitive times, before miracles ceased, "the merchandise of souls by feigned words," brought in ample gains; whilst love of the truth and of the brethren were the pretence, but covetousness was the concealed principle of their conduct. In vain do men of this character hope to escape with impunity: the judgment so long since foretold, and "the damnation" menaced, will speedily arrive; though unbelief may suppose that the justice of God "lingereth and slumbereth," because he "endures with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath which are fitted for destruction." (Note, Rom. 10:22,23.)

V. 4—9. The manifold "goodness of God," if it do not "lead men to repentance," and engage them to obedience, will no more secure them from condemnation, than the creating kindness of God to angels induced him to "spare" such of them as sinned in heaven itself; but "as he cast them down to hell, to be reserved in chains of darkness to the day of judgment to be punished;" so will he, in due season, execute "the vengeance that is written," on all impenitent sinners. (Notes, Rom. 2:4—11.) The destruction of the antediluvian world, and its millions of inhabitants, and that of Sodom and Gomorrah, stand on record to confute the vain nations of those who imagine that God is so lenient, that he will not take vengeance on his rebellious creatures. But his mercy shines forth conspicuously, in preserving Noah and his family, and in delivering him from the flood, and from that perverse generation, to which he was so long a most unsuccessful "preacher of righteousness:" but still more in rescuing Lot, and dealing with him as "a righteous man," notwithstanding all the blemishes of his character. Yet his vexation in Sodom, and his escape from the destruction of that abandoned city, with the loss of every thing except his life, loudly warn us to keep separate, as much as possible, from ungodly connexions, if we would avoid the most heart-rending anguish and the most painful and reiterated corrections. But, if indeed we do fear, trust, love, and obey the Lord; we should recollect in all our conflicts and trials, that "he knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation;" that he has ten thousand ways of rescuing us, of which we never thought; and that his wisdom and power will surely effect the purposes of his love, and the engagements of his truth: whilst wicked men often escape suffering here, because "they are reserved to the day of judgment to be punished," with "the devil and his angels," in that eternal state of hopeless misery, to which they are doomed.

V. 10—14. Whilst we take encouragement from the tender mercies of our God, let us also stand in awe of his holiness and justice. None have more cause to tremble, than they who are emboldened to gratify their sinful passions by presuming on his grace and mercy; nor can any thing more fully illustrate the desperate wickedness of the human heart, than the abominations, in which men have wallowed, while professing to be religious, and while contending for the holy doctrines of Christianity! Many, both in ancient and modern times, have deemed themselves at liberty to "walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness," and have "despised government" of all kinds: as if licentiousness and anarchy were the only desirable freedom; presumption and self-will equivalent to holy confidence and boldness in the Lord; and calumnies, or revilings, against "the powers that be," the proper way of "rendering to Cesar the things which are Cesar's, and to God the things that are God's!" Such liberty of conscience, and license of speech and conduct, holy "angels, who are greater in power and might," never thought of. If we were more like them, we should be more cautious in speaking and acting; and more scrupulous not to "bring a railing accusation" against others, especially our governors; though we could not approve of either their character or their measures. But there have been in every age, professors of the gospel, who have acted "like natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed," and have deemed themselves authorized to "speak evil of those things which they did not understand." And if they venture to "speak evil" of the divine law, and deem themselves freed from all obligation to obey it; can we wonder, that they should cast off every yoke, discard all subordination, wish to level all distinctions, and disdain subjection to every human authority, which must always be defective, and liable in some things, to censure! (Notes, 2 Sam. 15:1—6. P. O. 1—12. Note, 1 Kings 12:4. P. O. 1—20.) But let Christians stand at a distance from such contests; for alas! many running into these excesses, bring their characters into suspicion, and open the mouths of those who speak evil of us, as of evildoers; nay, many "utterly perish in their own corruption."—Especially let us fear a licentious profession of the gospel: doubtless they "will receive the reward of unrighteousness, who count it pleasure to riot in the daytime." These are indeed "the spots and blemishes" of the church, who "sport themselves in their own deceivings;" who join with Christians in sacred ordinances, and with the world in their licentious and dissipated revels; and who attempt to reconcile these things, by perverting the doctrines of the gospel, and boasting of their liberty and privileges! But could it have been conceived, if Scripture and facts had not evinced it, that teachers and professors of the holy doctrine of Christ, could preserve their confidence, credit, and influence, whilst "their eyes are full of adultery," and while "they cannot cease from sin?" that "unstable souls" could be beguiled by such men? and that success should attend the "covetous practices" in which their hearts are exercised? or that they should be considered as blessed who are indeed the children of the curse, and evidently described as such in the word of God? (Ps. 10:3.)

V. 15—22. Heresies and divisions in every age have grown out of the ambition, avarice, and licentiousness of teachers; and men have "forsaken the right way, and gone astray" after Balaam's example and from his vile principle, because they "loved the wages of unrighteousness:" but they will be "rebuked for their iniquity," and punished for "their madness," with as much contempt and severity as he was. Being "wells without water, and clouds carried about" as the wind of favour or lucre changes, it is plain that to them "the mist and blackness of darkness is reserved for ever." Those who would escape these deceivers should consider, that they abound in "high swelling words" of vain boasting and ostentation; and speak of themselves, as if wisdom and knowledge belonged exclusively to them; at the same time that they give great indulgence to the lusts of the flesh. Thus they allure, with the hope of sensual gratification, worldly advantages, and impunity in them, such "stony-ground hearers," as under convictions and transient affections, had "escaped from those that live in error." Persons of this description, not valuing the liberty of obeying the commandments of God, are disposed to listen to those who promise them liberty of another sort, and assure them that their practical instructers have held them in bondage: and thus antinomian tenets are embraced, as a covert way of returning to the world and sin, and as a more specious and quiet kind of apostacy. For the liberty promised by those who are overcome by their own lusts and passions, can be no other than licentiousness: and if after men have "escaped the pollutions of the world, by the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled" in such delusions, and brought back under the dominion of their lusts; "the latter end is worse with them than the beginning:" nor is such a departure from practical Christianity to antinomian principles and behaviour, less fatal than open apostacy; as it serves to keep the conscience entirely asleep, perhaps more effectually than any other opiate yet devised by the grand deceiver of mankind. It is evident, therefore, that "it would have been better" for such men, if they had continued ignorant of the gospel; than thus to pervert it to their own deeper condemnation, and the ruin of others along with them. Yet, alas, how many are there, who thus verify "the true proverb," by "turning as the dog to his own vomit again, and as a sow that is washed to her wallowing in the mire!" But this shall never happen to any, who are "in Christ new creatures," and made partakers of a divine nature. Let us then pray continually, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right Spirit within me:" let us remember, that a "holy commandment" is given to us, as well as "exceedingly great and precious promises;" let us beware of turning from the precepts, as much as of rejecting the truths, of Christianity; and let us equally avoid antinomian corrupters, and pharisaical opposers of the gospel, as alike the enemies of "our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—4. "This second epistle" appears, by the opening of this chapter, to have been primarily addressed to the same churches as the former; though this is not mentioned at the beginning of it. (Preface. Note,

5 For this [m]they willingly are ignorant of, that [n]by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth [o]standing out of the water and in the water:

1:1,2.) It was the design of the apostle, in both his epistles, not so much to instruct his brethren in truths, which they had not learned; as to stimulate and animate their "pure," sincere, and upright "minds" to practise their duty, by recalling to their remembrance the truths and precepts which they had been taught: lest remaining sinfulness, temptation, forgetfulness, and the artifices of false teachers, should turn them aside from it. (Notes, 1:12—15. 1 John 2:20—25. 4:1—6.) He therefore wrote to them, in order that they might be mindful "of the words" which "the holy prophets" of old had spoken, concerning the salvation and kingdom of Christ; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) and "of the commandment," which had been given them by him, and the other "apostles of the Lord and Saviour," to prepare for his coming to judgment, with patient expectation and diligence in their several duties. Of this they needed to be admonished; as they ought to know in the first place, and as a matter of chief importance, that, under the Christian dispensation, and after some time had elapsed, (Note, 1 John 2:18,19.) there would certainly come among them a set of scornful men, endeavouring to subvert their faith, by deriding their expectation of "the coming" of Christ to judgment; and treating the great truths of the gospel with infidel contempt and profane ridicule; whilst they indulged, without restraint, the several corrupt inclinations of their own evil hearts. These persons would insolently demand, what has become of "the promise" which the Lord had left them, that he would appear a second time among them, to complete their salvation, and destroy their enemies. Had it not manifestly failed? And would they suffer themselves to be any longer imposed on, or continue to adhere to his self-denying, persecuted religion? For it could not be denied, that "since the fathers" (the primitive teachers and professors of Christianity, or the ancient patriarchs and prophets, to whom it was first revealed,) "had fallen asleep, all things had continued," in respect of the returning seasons, and all other outward dispensations, as they had been used to do "from the beginning of the world;" without any material alteration answerable to the extraordinary things which had been spoken on that subject.

V. 5—7. The scoffers, of whom the apostle wrote, (some of whom seem to have been even then endeavouring to corrupt the church,) were "willingly ignorant" of the scriptural account of the creation, and of the dealings of God with men in former ages: for they perversely withdrew their attention from such subjects, as tended to confute their self-conceited and profligate infidelity, and to confirm the doctrine of a future judgment. (Notes, Prov. 14:6. John 3:19—21. Rom. 1:28—32.) Otherwise, they would have known, from the books of Moses, that the heavens and the earth were originally created, by the omnipotent word of God; who "spake and it was done, who commanded and it stood fast:" and that the earth especially was formed out of the chaos which had been previously brought into existence for that purpose: the dry ground being, at the command of God, separated from the waters, which retired to the channels prepared for them. (Notes, Gen. 1:1—9. Job 38:8—11. Ps. 24:1,2. 104:6—9.) Thus the earth, or dry land, with its productions and inhabitants, as distinguished from the seas, "stood up out of and above the water;" but it was surrounded by the water, which was needful to moisten, and purify it, and to render it fruitful. Yet, when the wickedness of men had provoked the Lord to execute vengeance on them; this very arrangement, in itself so conducive to the welfare of mankind, became the means of their destruction: for all the parts of the globe being deeply covered with waters, by the omnipotence of God, "the world that then was perished;" all the inhabitants of the dry land, and all the works of men were entirely destroyed; nothing remained, "but Noah and they that were with him in the ark;" the external appearance of the earth was, no doubt, greatly altered; and a new race of inhabitants were raised up to people it. (Notes, Gen. 6:13, 7. 7:10—24.) At the same time, the Lord promised, and covenanted, never more to destroy the earth by a universal deluge: (Gen. 8:20—22. 9:9—17. Is. 54:6—10.) yet intimations had been given of a total dissolution, which was to terminate the present state of things; (Notes, Ps. 102:25—28. Is. 51:4—6.) and under the New Testament dispensation, it was more expressly revealed that this would be effected "by fire." It might therefore be said, that the visible heavens, and the earth with all the lower creation, were condemned to be destroyed by fire; and, by the word of God, which could not be broken, were treasured up as fuel for the general conflagration. This would certainly take place about the same time with the great "day of judgment," which would prove "the day of perdition to ungodly men," who would then be "punished with everlasting destruction." (Notes, 10—13. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Rev. 20:11—15.) The event was therefore certain; and the same power was engaged to effect it, which had created the world, destroyed it by the deluge, restored it to its present form, and still continued to uphold it in that state.

V. 8. Whatever scoffers were "willingly ignorant of," or perversely cavilled at, as if delays were failures, or respites impunity; Christians must "not be ignorant of that one thing," which tended to clear up all the rest; namely, that the divisions of time among men bear no proportion to eternity, with which all the counsels and purposes of God are immediately connected. "Let then, this one thing not be concealed from you;" that one day, and a thousand years, are with God the same thing; for as every event comes to pass, exactly at the time which he has appointed for it; the intervention of a thousand years is no more than one day, in respect of those things which he will most assuredly accomplish in their season.—This maxim, well considered, is the key for reconciling what is continually said, concerning the speedy approach of judgment, with the prophecies, extending through many ages, which must previously be accomplished. (Notes, Ps. 90:3—6. 2 Thes. 2:1—12. Rev. 11:1,2. 20:4—6.)

V. 9. It must by no means be supposed, that the Lord "is slack," or dilatory, concerning the performance of his promise: as some men (both profane unbelievers, and impatient believers) might understand the word: (Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. Luke 18:1—8.) but, in fact, the delay of judgment was the effect of his longsuffering towards the church, and the human race. He patiently, and with much "longsuffering," endured the provocations of the wicked, and even the scornful defiance of infidels; because he would not be influenced by their crimes, to terminate the present state of things, till all who shall eventually be saved, were brought to repentance and prepared for the kingdom; as he was not willing that any of them should perish. He "delighted not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live;" and his longsuffering gave sinners space for repentance: and as all things were ready, and all were invited, yea, commanded to repent; in this sense, God had shown himself "unwilling that any should perish," and "willing that all should come to repentance;" though many would pervert his longsuffering to their deeper condemnation. Men's impenitence arises from their unwillingness to return to God, not from his unwillingness to receive them: and therefore he is doubtless "willing that all should come to repentance" and be saved; but no one can conceive, that he absolutely willeth the salvation of the wicked, in the same sense as he willeth that of the righteous, ("I will, be thou clean,") and yet is unable to effect it! Many, who were Christians at the time when the apostle wrote, owed their salvation to "the longsuffering of God," who thus gave them time and grace for repentance: and even some of those, who were then objecting to the delay of Christ's coming, as if it invalidated the truth of the gospel, might at length be converted, and know that "God was not willing that they should perish, but that they should come to repentance."—These are two distinct, but consistent views, which may be taken of the subject: the one accords to the condition of sinners, when first taught to attend to the word of salvation; to them, "the longsuffering" of God, the provisions of the gospel, the general invitations, the "command to all men to repent," and the promises that Christ will cast out none who come to him, are so many assurances, that "the Lord is not willing that any," who seek salvation, "should perish:" but that sinners of all descriptions should come to repentance; and that they who repent, do that which pleases him, and shall be accepted. (Notes, Ez. 18: 23. 33:11. John 6:36—40. 1 Tim. 2:3,4. Rev. 2:20—23.) But the other refers to God: "known unto whom are all his works, from the beginning of the world:" and according to it, the established believer ascribes his willingness to repent to special grace; and acknowledges that if he had been left to himself, he should have perished in obstinate love of sin, and suffering to us-ward, [y]not willing that any should perish, [z]but that all should come to repentance.

10 But [a]the day of the Lord will come [b]as a thief in the night; [c]in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and [d]the elements shall [e]melt with fervent heat, [f]the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up.

11 Seeing then that [g]all these things shall be dissolved, [h]what manner of persons ought ye to be [i]in all holy conversation and [k]godliness,

12 [l]Looking for and [m]hasting unto [n]the coming of the day of God, wherein [o]the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall [p]melt with fervent heat?

13 Nevertheless we, [q]according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. [Practical Observations.]

14 Wherefore, beloved, [r]seeing that ye look for such things, [s]be diligent that ye may be found of him [t]in peace, without spot and blameless.

15 And [u]account that the longsuffering of our Lord is salvation; even as [v]our beloved brother Paul also, [x]according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you:

enmity to God, as numbers of his fellow-sinners do.—Let it be particularly noticed, that God "willeth all men to repent," exactly in the same manner as he "willeth all men to be saved," so that none who do not repent can have any benefit from his willingness that all should be saved.

V. 10—13. Though delays seemed to be made whilst the Lord waited to complete the counsels of his wisdom and mercy, and to render the implacable enmity of impenitent sinners manifest to the whole creation; yet his great and terrible day would certainly come, suddenly when not expected, and with most surprising consternation, and inevitable destruction, to all who were found unprepared. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Matt. 24:42—44. 1 Thes. 5:1—3.) At that important catastrophe, "the heavens" and all the host of them, (as far, at least, as connected with this earth and its inhabitants,) "will pass away," and rush into confusion and destruction; with a tremendous "noise," of which thunders, earthquakes, and all other convulsions of nature, are wholly inadequate to give the least conception. Then all "the elements," of which the earth and its atmosphere, and all the luminaries connected with it, are composed, shall melt "with intense heat:" and not only one vast city, or one whole nation, but the earth, with all its cities, forests, mountains, yea, the contents of its bowels to the very centre, as well as all the works of men, however admired or magnificent, which cover the surface of it, shall constitute one vast conflagration, and be reduced to as confused a chaos, as that from which it was first created; and indeed shall "wholly pass away." (Notes, Ps. 102:23—28. Matt. 24:32—35. Heb. 1:10—12. Rev. 20:11—15.) "Seeing, therefore, all those things," which are the objects of the senses, and the coveted, admired, or envied possessions of men, must certainly be dissolved and perish, as to their present mode of existence; "what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversation and godliness," who believe and expect these things? For it must be evident, that at the period referred to, they who had no treasure secured in heaven, nor any interest in him as a Saviour, who would then come as the Judge of the world, would be most miserable. Ought not Christians therefore to be continually "looking for," and preparing to welcome that solemn season, called emphatically "the day of God;" "hastening" to have all ready to meet him with comfort, and even longing for the solemn catastrophe which would perfect their felicity? (Note, Luke 21:25—28.) Though it was in itself so terrible to think of, "the heavens being on fire and dissolved, and the elements melting with heat;" (Marg. Ref. c—p.) yet the gospel suggested such consolation, and inspired such hopes, that believers had no reason for terror or uneasiness: for though all other inheritances and distinctions must then be terminated; yet they, according to the sure promise of God, "looked for" and expected "new heavens and a new earth," another and far more glorious and blessed state of things, and an abiding habitation, into which righteous persons alone could find admission; and in which all the inhabitants would be perfected in purity, obedience, and love of each other; so that no sin could enter, to defile or disquiet them to all eternity.—In some Scriptures, "new heavens and a new earth," seem figuratively to describe the most prosperous and peaceful days of the church on earth; (Notes, Is. 65:17—19. 66:19—23. Heb. 12:26—29.) yet here the state of the righteous, after the day of judgment, and the dissolution of this present world, are evidently intended: but what is meant, in various particulars, the fulfilment alone can fully explain. (Note, Rev. 21:1—4,22—27. 22:1—5.)

V. 14—16. From the preceding considerations the apostle took occasion to exhort his beloved brethren, who professed to believe and "look for such things," to prove that they really did so, by diligence in every duty and 'means of grace;' that they might be "found of Christ at his coming, in peace" with God, with their own consciences, with each other, and with all men; being "without spot, and blameless.' (Notes, Phil. 1:14—18. 3:8 _1. 1 John 2:26—29. Jude 20,21.) For if they thus evinced themselves "partakers of Christ," by the diligent obedience of faith and love; they would certainly be then "presented faultless before" God, and as perfect in regard to sanctification as justification.—They ought also "to account the longsuffering of the Lord to be salvation." Every day that their lives were spared, gave them the opportunity of diligently seeking "to make their calling and election sure." (Notes, 1:5—11.) Professed Christians had space afforded them, to seek a real and more influential experience of the work of divine grace: and "the goodness of God" was suited and intended to "lead sinners to repentance." All, therefore, who read the epistle ought to "account the longsuffering of the Lord to be salvation:" as they owed it to that alone, that they were not then in the place of despair and final misery, instead of the land of hope, of prayer and forgiveness, or in the way of peace and salvation.—The apostle likewise observed, that his "beloved brother Paul" also had written to them, to the same effect, "according to the wisdom, which" God had bestowed on him. The affectionate and highly respectful language, here used by St. Peter, concerning "the apostle of the Gentiles," who was supposed to differ from him in some points of doctrine, and who had openly rebuked his dissimulation at Antioch, is peculiarly worthy of observation. (Note, Gal. 2:11—16.) The fourth and fifth verses of the second chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, are generally supposed to be intended; (Note, Rom. 2:4—6.) but it is not obvious in what sense these could be said to be written to those whom St. Peter addressed. They therefore, who maintain that he wrote to the Jewish converts exclusively, point out some passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews, to which they think he alluded. (Heb. 9:27,28. 10:36,37.) Yet that epistle was directly addressed to the churches in Judea, and not to the Jewish converts in Asia: so that this does not much aid their supposition. But, indeed, the apostolical epistles, though written to some particular churches, or description of Christians, were evidently intended for general instruction: and as Peter had read the epistles of Paul when he wrote this; so they, to whom he wrote, had probably done the same, even in respect of those which were addressed to other churches.—The false teachers whom Peter opposed, seem to have grounded their "damnable heresies" (Note, 2:1—3.) on a misinterpretation of some passages in St. Paul's epistles, which might appear to some persons contrary to Peter's exhortations: so that the general tenor of the epistles to some of the Asiatic churches, or of that to the Hebrews, rather than detached expressions, seems to have been meant; for certainly, when properly understood, they are as exhortatory and practical as St. Peter's. Indeed, the apostle next observed, that this was the case in all the epistles of his beloved brother Paul; (as those to the Romans, the Corinthians, the churches of Macedonia, and to Timothy and Titus; as well as those to Ephesus, and Colossè, and the Hebrews;) for in them all, he spoke of the coming of Christ, and the preparation to be made for it, with warnings and admonitions to different descriptions of persons. Yet in these epistles, connected with plainer subjects, were some things "hard to be understood," namely, such as related to the decrees of God, and the deep dispensations of his government; and the sovereignty of his grace in saving some, and leaving others to be hardened; (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 9:11:) for of these things doubtless Peter principally spoke. Such subjects would not be properly understood, except by those, who had come to some maturity in knowledge, grace, and experience, and who received them in humble and simple faith and love. "The unlearned and unstable," therefore, even such as were untaught in the school of Christ, or unteachable through pride, prejudice, and carnal passions, and unestablished in faith and by sanctifying grace, "wrested," or perverted them, by a forced and unnatural interpretation, inconsistent with the context and the apostle's general doctrine; and adduced them in support of their arrogant, corrupt, and licentious principles and conduct: and thus they compassed their own destruction. But this perversion of St. Paul's writings (which Peter evidently here speaks of as a part of the sacred Scriptures) must not be charged on the epistles themselves; but on those who thus perverted them, contrary to their real meaning and tendency: for they thus "wrested the other Scriptures also," both the books of the Old Testament, and as many of the New Testament as were then extant, and allowed to be of divine authority. Proud, carnal, ambitious, covetous, or licentious men, could wrest some things, in any of them, to a seeming agreement with their pernicious doctrines, and so pervert them to their own destruction; in the same manner, as they made a fatal use of the mysterious subjects on which St. Paul discoursed. It was therefore proper to warn and instruct men to read them with humility and a teachable spirit; and not to perplex themselves with "hard things," till they were established in such as were more plain. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Heb. 5:11—14.)—This, however, is no reason why either St. Paul's epistles, or any part of the other Scriptures, should be laid aside, or put out of sight; for men, left to themselves, pervert every good gift of God, and the corruption of the best things becomes the worst.—'The persons, to whom Peter's epistles were written, were for the most part Paul's converts.'—'Of this vice' (wresting the Scriptures,) they are most commonly guilty, who, from the pride of understanding, will receive nothing but what they can explain. Whereas the humble and teachable receive the declarations of revelation, according to their plain, grammatical, unconstrained meaning; which it is their only care to attain, by reading the Scriptures frequently, and with attention.' Macknight. He should have added, 'and with constant, fervent prayer, for the promised teaching and guidance of the Holy Spirit.'

V. 17, 18. As those whom Peter addressed, had been previously instructed and frequently warned concerning these things: they ought to be upon their guard against the insinuations of deceivers, and to "beware" of the rock, on which so many had split; lest, being drawn from the simplicity of believing obedience to the Lord Jesus, through the errors and delusions of wicked men, especially of those licentious teachers whom he had before described; they should "fall from that steadfast" adherence to the truths of the gospel, that constant profession of faith, and that uniform course of consistent behaviour, which they had hitherto maintained; and which constituted a "steadfastness" peculiar to mature believers, and distinguishing them from numbers of "unstable" professors of Christianity. In order to be assured, that this would never be their case, they ought to use every appointed means, with the greatest earnestness, that all holy affections might be invigorated in their hearts, that their grace might grow to more confirmed habits, and be productive of good works in greater abundance: and that they might also increase continually in a believing, spiritual, experimental, and transforming knowledge of Jesus Christ, as their Lord and Saviour. (Notes, 1:5—11.) After this important exhortation, the apostle concluded with ascribing glory to Christ, as God, without mentioning the Father: (John 5:23.) and with desiring that it might, or rejoicing that it would, be given to him, both at that time and for ever. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The "purest minds" of men on earth want "stirring up by way of remembrance;" that, by habitual attention to the doctrine and precepts delivered by "the holy prophets and apostles," they may be kept steadfast in faith, fervent in love, and diligent in obedience.—The only wise God our Saviour, by predicting the scoffs and contemptuous objections of infidels and profane men, in ancient and modern times, has taken care, that even their perverse opposition to the Scripture should furnish an additional proof of its divine inspiration!—No wonder, that they, who "walk after their own lusts," endeavour to deride our expectation of a future judgment, and of the eternal destruction of all those who "will not have Christ to reign over them;" or that they catch at every thing which can help to buoy up their chief hope of "escaping the damnation of hell." Most of their cavils and sneers expose their ignorance of "the Scriptures and of the power of God;" yet their very ignorance is the consequence of their ungodliness, and wilful opposition to those parts of divine truth, which condemn their darling iniquities. But none, who read and believe the sacred oracles, can be ignorant, that the omnipotent Creator of the heavens and the earth, who upholds, preserves, changes, or destroys his own work, as he sees good, has his whole plan before him; that "the heavens and earth, which are now, are reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment," which will also be "the day of perdition," to all "ungodly men;" that God alone is competent to determine about times and seasons; and that "with him one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."

V. 9—13. The Lord, in reality, makes no delays: however his dispensations may appear to our unbelief and scanty knowledge, he "is not slack concerning his promises," according to men's notions of "slackness;" but he is "slow to anger," "he waiteth to be gracious," he "delighteth not in the death of a sinner," and he is "willing" that any perishing rebel "should come to repentance," and seek his salvation.—Yet "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure:" that "great day of the Lord shall come as a thief in the night:" even as surely as the deluge came, and equally unexpected by unbelievers. (Note, Matt. 24:36—41.)—What will then be the surprise, the terror, and anguish of proud scoffers, infidels, and all ungodly and worldly men, "when the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also and all the works that are therein shall be burnt up!" Here imagination itself is baffled; description would be vain; and we can only apply the inconceivable subject to practical purposes. (Notes, Rev. 6:15—17. 20:11—15.) "Seeing all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversation and godliness?" Surely Christians should not "lay up their treasures on earth," or "set their affections on things below!" It is our chief business to prepare for this great catastrophe by daily expecting and "hastening to" the coming of the day of God; that we may possess a triumphant hope of lifting up our heads with joy, when the heavens and the earth shall form one immense conflagration, and when no refuge will remain to the wicked from the intolerable wrath of their offended Judge, and that everlasting fire to which he will doom them: and to "look for the new heavens and the new earth," which God has promised; and to prepare for this blessed habitation, remembering that righteousness dwells there, without alloy or interruption; and no unclean person can find admission.

V. 14—18. In the firm belief of the great and eternal realities, set before us in this chapter, let us "give diligence to be found of Christ at his coming, in peace, without spot and blameless." Let sinners "account the longsuffering of our Lord to be salvation;" "seeking him while he may be found, and calling on him while he is near;" that they may have the privilege of blessing him to eternity, for sparing them when others were cut off in their sins.—We should also avail ourselves of the apostle's caution, whilst we read the epistles of St. Paul, and other difficult parts of the holy Scriptures. Most evident it is, that untaught, unteachable, self-sufficient, "unstable," and unconverted men, "wrest many things" of this kind "to their own destruction." Yet these parts of the sacred word have a most important use, in the system of divine truth; and if men will pervert them, they do it at their peril. But let us seek to have our minds prepared for the reception of such things as are "hard to be understood," by properly digesting and reducing to practice those parts which are most simple and intelligible, and let us take care not to give strong meat to babes who cannot digest it; as it only "belongs to those that are of full age, and who, by reason of use, have their senses exercised to discern good and evil." (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Heb. 5:11—14. P. O.) Thus taking things in their proper order, and proceeding with humility, caution, prayer, and practice, we shall be prepared to derive benefit from the deepest and most mysterious truths, and to perceive their consistency with the rest of divine revelation. Let all then, who know and read these things, "beware, lest, being led away by the error of the wicked, they fall from their own steadfastness:" and may we all "grow" continually "in grace, and the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," and ascribe glory to him now, in full assurance of doing the same for ever. Amen.

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF JOHN.

THIS epistle has been received, without hesitation, as written by the apostle John, in the church from the earliest ages: and the similarity of sentiment and expression, between it and his gospel, is a full confirmation that he was the writer, though his name is not prefixed to it. (Notes, Matt. 4:18—22. 10:1—4. 17:1,2. 20:20—23. 36:30—35. Mark 5:35—43, v. 37. 9:38—40. Luke 9:46—56. John 13:18—30. 19:25—27. 20:1—10. 21:18—23. Acts 3:1—11. 4:13—22. Gal. 2:6—10.)—From two expressions in the second chapter; "Because ye have known him that is from the beginning;" and "It is the last time;" several learned moderns have concluded, that it was written just before the destruction of Jerusalem, and to the Jewish converts exclusively: but it has been the more general opinion, that it was written much later than that event, and not long before the book of Revelation. (Note, Rev. 6:1,2.) The texts, on which the former opinion is grounded, do not seem to require, or even admit of that interpretation, which these learned men put upon them; (Note, 2:18,19.) and there is not the least intimation of any distinction between Jewish and Gentile converts, in the whole epistle. So that the term GENERAL or CATHOLIC strictly and properly belongs to it. For it appears, to me at least, the more probable opinion, that it was written towards the close of the apostle's life, after the death of all the other apostles: and that it was intended as a circular letter, or a general address, to all the Christian churches, which was known to come from the only surviving apostle. The authoritative yet affectionate manner, in which the writer addresses his dear children, favours this conclusion: (Note, 2:1,2.) and the heretics, or antichrists, whom he evidently intended to oppose, came forward much more openly, at this time, than at an earlier period. It is generally allowed, that they who denied the real Deity of Christ; they who explained away his proper humanity, and the reality of his sufferings and death, as an atoning sacrifice; and those who taught their followers, that believers, being "saved by grace," were not required to obey the commandments of God, were the principal antichrists. These were branched out into a variety of subdivisions called by different names; such as Ebionites, Cerinthians, Docetæ, or Phantasiastæ, Gnostics, Nicolaitans, &c. on which ecclesiastical writers have enlarged abundantly. The apostle, however, did not name any of them, and his language was suited to refute and expose many other heretical sentiments, both of ancient and modern times; and in that view the epistle is highly interesting to us. He expatiates also on the love of God to us, as shown in the salvation of his Son; and, again and again, most pathetically enforces on believers love to each other, as shown in its practical effects, by almost every motive imaginable. This, I suppose, has given occasion to the general opinion of his being himself of a most loving disposition, even more so than the other apostles. Our Lord, however, called him, and James his brother, Boanerges: (Note, Mark 3:13—19.) and the faithful, plain, and even sharp manner, in which he speaks of hypocrites and false teachers, sufficiently illustrates the reason for which that name was given.—He also lays down various marks and evidences, by which Christians might be distinguished, both by themselves and others, from self-deceivers and hypocrites: and, while this epistle differs exceedingly, in style and manner, from those of the other apostles, it perfectly coincides with them in doctrine and practical instruction.

A. D. 90.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle declares, what he had seen and heard of Christ, the Word of life; that others might have fellowship with him, and with God and Christ, and might share his joy, 1—4. He shows that those who have communion with God, and are cleansed from sin by the blood of Christ, walk in the light of holiness, 5—7; and that the faithfulness and righteousness of God are engaged for the pardon and cleansing of those who "confess their sins;" but that all who "say they have no sin," or "have not sinned," are deceived or deceivers, 8—10.

NOTES—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Note, John 1:1—3.) The apostle began this epistle, in the same abrupt manner as he did his gospel, and without any particular address or salutation: and he wrote as a witness or a messenger, in a sententious declaratory style, and not in an argumentative manner.—"That which was from the beginning;" that essential Good, that uncreated and self-existent Excellency, which had been from the beginning, as coequal and coeternal with the Father, and had at length appeared in human nature for the salvation of sinners, was the great subject, concerning which the apostle wrote to his brethren. If we then understand him to mean Christ as the Son of God, (and it does not appear what else could be meant,) "from the beginning" must denote from eternity: for if the creation and time were coeval, "That which was from the beginning," when "God created the heavens and the earth," must have been eternal. (Notes, Gen. 1:1. Prov. 8:22—30.) Indeed the same expression, in some places may signify the first opening of the dispensation of the gospel: (2:7,8.) yet this sense does not appear at all consistent with the context in this place. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) The obvious meaning however is this: that essential Good, which "was from the beginning with God, and was God," "by whom all things were created," had "become flesh," to dwell on earth among men; and the apostle and his brethren, especially the other apostles, had heard him deliver his doctrine, and publish his salvation: they had seen him with their eyes, while they "beheld his glory, as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." (Note, John 1:14.) They had not only viewed him with a transient glance; but had accompanied him, and contemplated him, both in respect of the wisdom and holiness of his character, the power of his miracles, and his abundant love and mercy, during some years; till they saw him expire on the cross, and afterwards risen from the dead: and "their hands had handled him," while he condescended to give them this full proof of his resurrection, that they might witness it to others. (Notes, Luke 24:36—43. John 20:19—29.) This divine Person, "the Word of life," "the Word of God," became incarnate, that he might be "the Life of men;" and this "great mystery of godliness" the apostle declared to mankind. (Notes, 5:11,12, 20,21. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Indeed he wrote to assure his Christian brethren throughout the world, yea, and all future ages, of the reality of Christ's human nature, which some in those days denied, and that of his divine nature, which his resurrection fully demonstrated. (Note, Rom. 1:1—4.) For "the Life," the Source and Author of life, natural, spiritual, and eternal, who possessed "life in himself," necessarily and unchangeably, and who might therefore be called "the Life;" life being essential to him, and derived from him to all creatures; even he had been "manifested in the flesh," to be the Life of fallen men. (Notes, John 1:4—9. 8:12. 11:20—27. 14:4—6.) And when "the Son of God," the essential Life of all creatures, was thus manifested, the apostles were peculiarly favoured, in being chosen to be his attendants, and to see him, during his ministry, at his death, after his resurrection, and at his ascension; that they might bear witness to others of these things, and show unto them "that eternal Life," which had always subsisted with the Father, as "One with him," and yet distinct from him, One in the undivided essence of the Godhead, but possessing distinct personality, as "the only Begotten of the Father," by an eternal and incomprehensible generation; (Notes, John 1:14,18. 3:16.) and who "in the fulness of time" was manifested, as the Author and Giver of eternal life to sinners, through the redemption of his blood, and by the communication of his new creating Spirit. The apostles did not, therefore, proceed on report, or insufficient proof, when they went to the nations; and encountered all hardships, dangers, and persecutions, in preaching the gospel to them. (Note, 2 Pet. 1:16—18.) But they declared the things, concerning the Person, doctrine, and salvation of Christ, which they had seen and heard, and had the most abundant opportunity of learning from his own lips; and of which they had been assured by his miracles, resurrection, and ascension.

That which. (1) Ὅ.—The second person in the sacred Trinity is intended. Thus he says, "I and the Father are one." Ἓν, not εἷς. (Note, John 10:26—31, v. 30.) And thus the Evangelist, "That holy thing which shall be born of thee." Luke 1:35.—Handled.] Ἐψηλαφησαν. Luke 24:39 Acts 17:27. Heb. 12:18.

V. 3, 4. The apostle declared these things to his brethren, and to mankind in general, even to all who should ever read his epistle; not from selfish motives, but from the purest benevolence and love; in order that they might "have fellow-with us: and truly [p]our fellowship is with the Father, and [q]with his Son Jesus Christ.

4 And these things write we unto you, [r]that your joy may be full. [Practical Observations.]

5 This then is [s]the message which we have [t]heard of him, and declare unto you, [r]that God is Light, and in him is no darkness at all.

6 [u]If we say that we have [v]fellowship with him, and [u]walk in darkness, [w]we lie, and [x]do not the truth:

7 But [y]if we walk in the light, [z]as he is in the light, [a]we have fellowship one with another, [q]and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

8 If we [b]say that we have no sin, [w]we deceive ourselves, and [v]the truth is not in us.

9 If [c]we confess our sins, [a]he is faithful and [d]just to forgive us our sins, [e]and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.

10 If [f]we say that we have not sinned, [g]we make him a liar, and [h]his word is not in us.

ship with him," and the other apostles, and share their immunities, hopes, comforts, and everlasting advantages: and whatever an ungodly world might imagine, concerning the condition of such poor, despised, and persecuted men, whom they treated as the "offscouring of all things;" "truly their fellowship was with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." They shared the special love and favour of God the Father; all his perfections ensured their happiness; they were made "partakers of his holiness," and even "of a divine nature;" and they had the assured hope and blessed earnests of enjoying him, as their all-sufficient and eternal Portion. Moreover, they had a free access to him, as their Father: and, a sacred union having been formed between him and their souls, through Jesus Christ, and by the power of the Holy Spirit, a most honourable and happy communion and intercourse was continually carried on between the glorious God and them; while they poured out their inmost souls before him, made him their Hope and Confidence, aimed to do his will and manifest his glory, celebrated his praises, were his devoted worshippers, and sought their felicity in his favour and acceptance: while in return, he graciously heard their supplications, accepted their persons and services, communicated to them his holy consolations, showed them his will, supplied them with wisdom and strength suited to their wants, and took on him the care of all their concerns.—This "fellowship with the Father," arose from their "fellowship with his Son Jesus Christ." By faith, they became partakers of him and his salvation; so that, "of God he was made to them Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption;" and, by a continued regard to his Person, mediation, and grace, and an habitual reliance on him, as the Life and Salvation of their souls, they had access to God as a Father. Thus, through the incarnate Son, and his righteousness, sacrifice, and intercession, and the communion maintained with him by faith; they had "communion with the Father" also, notwithstanding their sinfulness. (Note, John 17:1—3.) This was no enthusiastic imagination, or hypocritical pretence, as many were disposed to represent it; nor was it an unsatisfactory or inefficacious transaction, as others might suppose, who did not deny its reality; but they had the happy experience of it in their souls; manifested the excellency of it in their lives; and shared with their brethren, in this sacred communion, such comforts and substantial satisfaction, as made them ample amends for all their losses, sufferings, and hardships. Being therefore assured, that this alone was sufficient to make men happy; and knowing the inexhaustible "fulness of Christ," and his inestimable salvation: they desired exceedingly, that their fellow-sinners would come and share their felicity; and, leaving the lying vanities of the world, or the empty forms and superstitions of false religion, would seek with them this "fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ." This desire, glowing with intense ardour in the hearts of the apostles, and united with zeal for the honour of their Lord, animated them to all their self-denying labours, and reconciled them to all sufferings, in promoting the gospel. The same principle induced the apostle John to write this epistle to the churches, that, rejecting the heretical doctrines of false teachers, "having fellowship with Christ," and with those who adhered to the apostle's doctrine, and avoiding whatever could interrupt their communion with God, their holy joy might be complete, and they might live in actual possession of those invaluable privileges, to which they were called by the gospel.—The "communion of the Holy Spirit" is not particularly mentioned in this most interesting passage; because the communion of believers with the Father and the Son, and their loving communion with each other, are effected and maintained by the communication and influences of the Holy Spirit; who is the immediate Author of their spiritual life, hope, love, joy, peace, and holy affections; the bond of union between Christ and his mystical body, and between every member of it and all the others; the great blessing communicated from the Father's love, and through the incarnation and mediation of the Son; and the seal and pledge of all other blessings, in time and to eternity, and the preparation for them. As the Holy Spirit is, therefore, the great Agent in our "communion with the Father and the Son;" it was not necessary, that communion with him should be separately mentioned. (Note, 2 Cor. 13:11—14.)

Fellowship. (3) Κοινωνια. Note, Phil. 1:3—6.—The leading idea is participation; and communication, and reciprocal intercourse, and expressions of friendship, as resulting from it. (Note, Gen. 5:21—24.)—Full. (4) Πεπληρωμενη. Filled, or completed. John 3:29. 15:11. 16:24. 17:13. Phil. 2:2. 2 John 12.

V. 5—7. In order that Christians might obtain that "fulness of joy," of which the apostle spoke; and that they might be upon their guard against all delusive appearances, and all false pretences to communion with God; it was needful for him to state to them "the message," or declaration, which they "had heard from" Christ himself, concerning the nature and perfections of God. (Note, John 17:25,26.) The substance of this declaration is, "That God is Light," pure, perfect intellect, an all-pervading, all-penetrating Spirit, essential knowledge, wisdom, holiness, love, and felicity: so that "in him is no darkness at all;" no ignorance, error, moral evil, or defect in felicity; and therefore none of these can be derived from him. (Notes, Jam. 1:13—18.) As this is the nature of God, the doctrines and precepts which come from him must be of the same kind: true religion may be distinguished from counterfeit by this criterion; and especially his spiritual worshippers, who really have communion with him, may be known by their conformity to him. If then, any persons, professing Christianity, affirm, as a matter of experience, that "they have fellowship with God" according to the gospel, and consequently are partakers of his salvation; while at the same time, "they walk in darkness," or are deluded by Satan, through ignorance and false doctrine, to live in the habitual practice of sin, and so to have "fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness;" such persons speak falsehood, and are either deceiving or self-deceived hypocrites, whose conduct belies their profession: for they do not practise what is sincere and faithful, and according to the truths of the word of God. But if the professed disciples of Christ "walk in the light, as he was in the Light," acting habitually as becomes those who know God, and his holy truth and will; and imitating his purity, righteousness, goodness, and truth, in their behaviour among men; they may deem this a sufficient evidence, that they are "partakers of Christ," and interested in the love of the Father through him. (Notes, 2:7—11. Ps. 97:10—12. John 12:34—36. Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 5:8—14.) They are warranted to conclude, that "their fellowship with God," and the intercourse maintained between him and their souls, is the very same, in nature and efficacy, with that of which the apostle spake. They are admitted to 'the communion of the saints,' and entitled to all the privileges and blessings belonging to them, and ought to be the objects of their special love and complacency. And they may also be fully assured, that the "blood of Christ," the Son of God, has taken away the guilt of all their former sins, and removes that of all their daily defects, defilements, and transgressions; nay, that the Holy Spirit, as given through the merit of his atonement, is cleansing away, and will at length perfectly destroy all the sinfulness of their fallen nature. V. 8—10. While the apostle strenuously insisted on the necessity of an habitual holy walk, as the effect and evidence of the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, and of communion with him; he guarded with as much care against self-righteous pride, as against an antinomian perversion of the gospel. If any professed Christians, while they seemed to "walk in the light," should be so elated with a conceit of their own attainments, as to say, "that they had no sin;" but were perfectly pure, and as holy in heart and life as the law of God required; they were certainly deceived in a most awful manner: nay, "the truth was not in them," as a principle of life

CHAPTER II.

The apostle warns his "dear children" not to sin: yet points out to them Christ, the Advocate with the Father, and the Propitiation for their sins, and the sins of the world, 1, 2. He shows that the knowledge of Christ, and union with him, must be evidenced by obeying and imitating him, and by love of the brethren; that thus "the love of God is perfected in us;" and that those are deceived, blind, and hypocritical, who live in hatred and malice, 3—11. He warns believers, of every age and attainment, against "the love of the world;" showing the vanity of all that is in the world, compared with the eternal happiness of those who do the will of God, 12—17. He cautions them against many antichrists, who fatally seduce some professed Christians, 18, 19; declares that the unction of the Holy Spirit is the effectual preservative against them, 21, 22; points out to them the true doctrine of Christ; and exhorts them to adhere to his truth, and abide in him, in expectation of his coming; and to prove their regeneration by an habitual righteous conduct, 23—29.

MY [a]little children, [b]these things write I unto you, [c]that ye sin not. [d]And if any man sin, [e]we have an Advocate with [f]the Father, Jesus Christ [g]the righteous:

2 And [h]he is the Propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also [i]for the sins of the whole world.

3 And [k]hereby we do know that [l]we know him, [m]if we keep his commandments.

4 He [n]that saith, [o]I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, [p]is a liar, and the truth is not in him.

5 But [q]whoso keepeth his word, [r]in him verily is the love of God perfected: [s]hereby know we that we are in him.

and illumination; or they could never have fallen into a mistake, which implied gross ignorance of God, of his spiritual law, and of their own hearts. On the other hand, such as confessed their sins with unreserved, ingenuous, and sincere humiliation before God, (for that alone can be here intended;) owning their guilt and desert of wrath; not attempting to extenuate or deny their offences, but casting themselves wholly on the mercy of God for pardon; would certainly find him "faithful" to his promises, and "just" to his covenant engagements to Christ their Surety, and to them through him: yea, his very justice, (as satisfied by the atonement of his Son,) would induce him to forgive all their sins, how numerous and aggravated soever they had been; and to cleanse them, not only from the guilt, but gradually, and at length perfectly, from all the pollution of their unrighteousness. (Notes, Ps. 32:3—5. Prov. 28:13. Ez. 36:25—27. 2 Cor. 7:1.)—But if any continued to deny that they had sinned, and so implicitly to maintain that they needed not to confess guilt, or seek forgiveness and cleansing from sin; they, in fact, "treated the words of God as a lie," and his declaration of man's sinfulness as a libel on human nature; nay, they virtually denied the truth of the whole gospel, which every where speaks of men as sinners; so that the word of God was not in them, by faith, or by the teaching of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 5:9,10. Ps. 51:4. Rom. 3:3,4.)—In this latter verse the apostle opposed such persons as totally denied their sinfulness, their need of mercy, or their desert of wrath; by whatever method they deceived themselves into a confidence that they had never sinned; or that they had, in some way, made amends for their offences, or could do it, and were not justly deserving of punishment. "Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all." (Matt. 18:26.) But in the former, he showed the gross error of those who imagined, that, through the gospel, they were so perfectly sanctified, as to have no spot or blemish of sin in them: the present tense, "have no sin," being used in the eighth verse, (ἁμαρτιαν ουκ εχομεν,) and the past, in the tenth, "have not sinned," (ουκ ἡμαρτηκαμεν.) (Notes, Lev. 26:40—42. 1 Kings 8:33,34. Neh. 9:2,3. Job 33:27—30. Ps. 51:3—6. P. O. Dan. 9:)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. Our most lively gratitude is due to God for that fully authenticated revelation, which he has given us concerning "the Word of life," by those who heard and saw him, and who had the testimony of their senses, to the reality of his incarnation, and of his resurrection. But what words can express the praises of the love of God, in causing "the Life to be manifested," even "the eternal Life, which was with the Father," in order that we, justly condemned rebels, who were dead in sin, might live by him! This appears the more admirable, when we consider the deep abasement, and the agonizing sufferings, to which this manifestation exposed the incarnate Word and "Son of God;" nay, how his very humiliation has given occasion to the children of men, to rob him of his glory, to deny his Deity, and to speak of him whom "all angels worship," as if he were altogether such a one as themselves!—Faithful and zealous ministers, though they have not "seen and heard" "the Lord of glory," with their outward senses, may yet declare to men, what they have known and experienced of his mercy, truth, and power: and as he became incarnate, that the chief of sinners, believing in Christ, "might have fellowship with him," and share in the love of the Father through him, for their everlasting felicity; so they are willing to labour and suffer, that their fellow-criminals may be brought to "have fellowship with them," in their most precious blessings. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—21. 6:1,2.) However men may despise and revile them, and "cast out their names as evil," or deem them madmen, bigots, enthusiasts, or hypocrites, yet verily, they possess the greatest honour, pleasure, privilege, and advantage imaginable, in "communion with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ;" and in their liberty of "access with boldness," at all times, into the presence of the eternal God; while all the perfections and Persons in the Godhead are engaged, by covenant, to make them most blessed for evermore. These benefits are not like the scanty possessions of the world, which are congenial to the selfishness of our fallen nature, and excite the jealousy of every competitor; because the more that partake of them, the less each person can appropriate. But the joy and felicity of "communion with God" corresponds with the enlarged philanthropy of the regenerate soul, and tends to increase it; because the good enjoyed is infinite and all-sufficient; so that any multitude, however immense, may participate the joy, without its being at all diminished; nay, the felicity seems enhanced to each possessor, by its being communicated to increasing numbers. This "fellowship with the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ," is "the secret of the Lord," which is peculiar to those who fear him; and ungodly men must therefore treat it as the delusion of a heated imagination. (Notes, 5:9,10. Ps. 25:14. John 14:21—24. 2 Pet. 1:19. Rev. 2:17.) No doubt there are both enthusiasts and hypocrites, who are deceived, or mean to deceive others: yet that is not worth counterfeiting, either by Satan or wicked men, which in itself is of no value or reality. There are then those, who are warranted to say, "Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ;" and they all desire to bring others to partake of the same blessedness. Indeed it is the design of all the instructions in the word of God, to lead us to possess these consolations, that so "our joy may be completed," and we filled "with all the fulness of God." (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.)—For all other joy is not only unsatisfactory, but fading, withering, expiring.

V. 5—10. It is the grand interest, as well as the duty of all men, to regard "the message" sent to us by those who "declare that God is Light, and that in him is no darkness at all:" for as his perfect felicity is inseparable from his perfect holiness; so our happiness must be proportioned to our sanctification. By this rule we may also judge, who truly have fellowship with God, and who only make false professions of such a holy intercourse: for if any man profess this, and "walk in darkness, he is a liar, and does not the truth:" but if we habitually "walk in the light" of holy obedience, as it becomes those who have the transforming knowledge of God; "we have fellowship" with prophets and apostles, and with all saints, yea, with the Lord of saints himself; "and the blood of Jesus cleanses us from all sin." For Christianity is, in every respect, 'the religion of a sinner;' and they, who walk most nearly to God in holy conformity and obedience, are most deeply sensible, that their best days and duties are mixed with sin, and need cleansing by the atoning blood. No encouragement is therefore given in Scripture to any of those "who say they have not sinned," or that they have no longer any sin to repent of, to be pardoned, or to be cleansed away. Such men deceive themselves; yea, they "make God a liar, and his word is not in them:" they arraign the truth of his declarations, and the justice of his government; and cannot possibly offer "the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart" before him, or properly understand the nature and value of his gospel of abounding grace. Let us then learn to plead guilty before God, and be humbly willing to know the worst of our case. Let us ingenuously confess all our sins, and all their aggravations; relying wholly on his mercy and truth through the righteousness of Christ, for a full and free forgiveness; and let us trust in him as "a just God and a Saviour;" and wait on him, "to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," till no spot or blemish remain in us, even in the judgment of our holy and merciful Father. (Notes, Eph. 5:25—27. Col. 1:21—23. Jude 22—25.)

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. It is probable that John was the only surviving apostle, when he wrote this epistle: and his old age, and long-continued usefulness, faithfulness, and love to Christians, must have given him a kind of parental authority, throughout the whole church, as far as it adhered to the pure gospel of Christ. It was therefore peculiarly proper for him to address them as his spiritual family, whose welfare he had greatly at heart: and as most of them were young in years, compared with this beloved and truly venerable disciple, who probably was the oldest Christian on earth at that time; none ever could with such propriety adopt the endearing language of his Lord, and call his fellow-Christians, "My little," or my dear, "children," as he did. (John 13:33.) The diminutive is commonly used by way of endearment, and to express peculiar affection.—He was desirous of counselling warning, and encouraging them, "as a father does his children." (Note, 1 Thes. 2:9—12.)—The things, which he had written to them in the former chapter, and what he was about to add, were intended especially to preserve them from committing sin. Every part of the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ, was suited to display the malignant nature and effects of sin, and the determination of God not to let it go unpunished; to teach men to hate, dread, and flee from it, and to lead them to the love of God and holiness; as well as to give the most effectual encouragement, motives, and assistance, to "repent, and do works meet for repentance." Yet, "if any man had sinned," he should remember, that "he and his brethren had an Advocate with the Father."—Superficial speculators might here have been ready to charge the apostle with inconsistency, as if the latter part of the verse had contradicted the former: but the state of a Christian, in this world, is such, that encouragements "after having sinned," are as necessary as warnings against sin: for, through the remaining power of sin in his heart, the manifold snares of the world, and the power of Satan, 'he cannot always stand upright.' The most valiant soldier will be most furiously attacked by the enemy, and may sometimes be foiled: and despondency is as inimical to watchfulness, diligence, and holy obedience, as even carnal security itself. No man, on scriptural principles, can conclude himself to be any better than a hypocrite, who habitually commits sin, because God is ready to forgive the penitent: but the fallen, who desire to arise and renew the combat, have abundant encouragement so to do. From the sinner's first conviction of guilt, to the end of the Christian's warfare by death, the general rule is applicable, that, "if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father;" one, who has undertaken, and is fully qualified and authorized, to plead in the presence of God the Father, in behalf of every one who seeks for pardon, salvation, and all things pertaining to them, in his name, and in dependence on his meritorious intercession. This gracious Advocate never refuses his patronage to any one who seeks it, and he never pleads in vain. For he is "Jesus;" the Saviour, Emmanuel, the incarnate Son of God; and "Christ," the Messiah, the anointed One, chosen, appointed, commissioned, and consecrated to his office, as "a High-Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek." He alone is "the righteous One," who received his human nature pure from all spot of sin, and, as our Surety, perfectly obeyed the whole law of God, and so fulfilled a righteousness more valuable in itself, and more honourable to the Father, than that of all mere creatures could have been. Moreover, "He is the Propitiation for their sins:" for, through the atonement of his sacrifice on the cross, and his subsequent intercession, he rendered a holy and righteous God propitious and favourable to sinners; so that "he waiteth to be gracious" upon the true "mercy-seat," or propitiatory, of which that above the ark of the covenant was merely a type and shadow. (Note, Rom. 3:21—26.) Nor was the benefit of this propitiation to be confined to the Jewish nation, or to those who had already embraced Christianity; on the contrary, sinners all over the whole earth were admitted to share in it by believing the gospel: so that all men, in every land, and through all successive generations, ought to be invited to come to God, through this all-sufficient Atonement, and by this "new and living Way;" and all who accept this invitation, are as much "partakers of Christ," and of all his blessings, as if he had become incarnate, and died upon the cross, for them alone. (Notes, 1:3,4. John 1:29. 14:4—6.) So that there was most abundant encouragement to every one, in the whole world, who heard the gospel, to repent, and seek salvation by faith in the blood of Christ; but none to any man to continue unpenitent and unbelieving.

V. 3—6. True Christians might be "overtaken in a fault," or even fall into a grievous sin; and their infirmities and deficiencies in their daily walk would be many: yet an habitual and unreserved obedience to the commandments of God, was to be considered as the only proper evidence of a saving knowledge of Christ, and of God the Father in him: (Notes, 26—29. 3:11,12. Is. 53:11,12. John 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6. Phil. 3:8—11. 2 Pet. 1:3,4,8,9.) The "knowledge" of God, or of Christ, evidently signifies a believing, spiritual, and experimental acquaintance with him, and a cordial acceptance of his salvation, ensuring their participation of it. Professed Christians would desire to know, or be assured, that their faith and experience were genuine, and distinguishable from those of all hypocrites: and, as the apostle and his brethren "knew that they thus knew," or had known "Christ," not by exact notions, or transient high affections, or miraculous powers, but by a disposition of heart, habitually, unreservedly, and willingly to keep his commandments; so any other man might know his profession to be sincere, and his knowledge of Christ spiritual and saving, by the same evidence. But he who professed to be acquainted with Christ, and to believe in him, whilst he did not keep his commandments, in his habitual conduct, was a liar and a hypocrite, in whom there was no sincerity, and in whose heart the truth had no place. On the other hand, whoever he was, that remembered and observed the counsels, and obeyed the precepts of Christ, in him verily, or really, "the love of God was perfected;" the love of God to him as a chosen and redeemed sinner, had attained its end in his sanctification; and his love of God had produced its fruit, and was in a mature state, as the grafted tree is, when loaded with its intended and valued increase. (Note, Jam. 2:21—26.) By this, apostles and primitive Christians knew that they were in Christ through faith, and the communion of his Spirit, and thus alive to God through him. (Note, John 15:1—8.) Indeed if any man professed to "abide in Christ," "he ought so to walk as Christ had walked," in an habitual course of righteousness, holiness, truth and love; or else he could not expect to be believed by those who knew the transforming efficacy of the saving knowledge of Christ. (Note, 2 Cor. 3: 17,18.)—It is evident, that the obedience here spoken of, is the humble, sincere, unreserved, and loving obedience of a believer in Christ; which is not perfect, but attended with continual repentance, and application to his atoning blood for pardon and acceptance; as well as with a constant dependence on the Holy Spirit for grace, to enable him in any measure to perform it. (Notes, John 14:15—24. 15:9,11.) Yet, even this observance of the holy commandments of Christ, in imitation of his example, though far from real perfection, constitute a degree of holiness and excellency, of which none but true Christians have any adequate conception; and which, if universal, would render the earth in no small degree like heaven itself. (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.)—We do know, &c. (3) How astonishing is it, that when apostles so clearly speak of our knowing that we know Christ, and are in him and in a state of acceptance and peace with God; and when they so carefully show in what way this may be known; Christian divines should, without discrimination or hesitation, speak of assurance in terms of deep and bitter abhorrence. 'The demon of assurance.' Dr. Whitaker.—As if the word and the thing were both unscriptural and antiscriptural. (Notes, 20—25. Heb. 6:11,12.)—In fact no man, who duly considers the difference between eternal happiness and eternal misery; who is aware of his danger of eternal damnation, and who recollects that he may be in heaven or hell, in a day or an hour, can be quiet, without some degree of assurance, that he shall go to everlasting happiness, not to everlasting misery.

V. 7—11. In exhorting Christians to obey and imitate their Lord, as the proper evidence of their love to him, and to the Father who sent him, the apostle "wrote no new command" to them; but that which they had received from the beginning, and which, from the first, had been repeatedly enforced by Christ himself. Nay, in fact, it had been virtually in force from the beginning of the world; as it could not comprise more than was contained in the law, which required Israel "to love the LORD with all their hearts," and "their neighbour as themselves," and to "be holy as God was holy." 5,6.) Yet this old commandment, especially that precept which inculcated "the love of their brethren," might be called "a new commandment," as given to Christians. (Notes, John 13:31—35. 15:12—16.) This was true, in respect of him, their Lord and Saviour, in that he had newly shown them the immensity of his condescension, compassion, and self-denying love to sinners; and had laid them under new obligations to obey and imitate him, especially in "loving one another, as he had loved them." The command likewise was now enforced by his mediatorial authority, to the full exercise of which he had been lately exalted. It was also "true in them; as their situation was new, and differed widely from that of the Gentiles around them, and even from that of the people of God under the Mosaic dispensation: and as they were now united by a new bond of union, as fellow-soldiers, fellow-travellers, brethren, and coheirs of heavenly felicity. (Notes, 1 Cor. 12:12—26. Eph. 4:1—6.) So that the love of Christians to each other, as such, though virtually comprised in the love of their neighbours as themselves, and in some things like that of the Israelites to each other, was new in respect of its exercise, motives, rules, and obligations. This arose from the change which had taken place; as the comparative "darkness" of the preparatory dispensation was past, and the "true light" shone in full splendour: (Note, 2 Tim. 1:10.) so that Christians might be expected to be more exact in their obedience, and more full of love to one another, and to all men, than even believers had been, under the darker dispensation of the law. He, therefore, who professed to walk in "the marvellous light" of the gospel, as partaking of the special grace and mercy of God; (Notes, 1:5—7. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.) and who yet hated his brother, (either any of his fellow-Christians, or his neighbours,) was evidently "in darkness even to that time:" for, though the true light shone around him, he was blinded by his pride and selfishness. Thus he continued a subject of "the prince of darkness," the author of all malice, envy, murder, and malignity: for the illumination of the true knowledge of Christ always transformed the heart in proportion to its degree, and produced a loving disposition in all those who really partook of it. But he who "loved his brother," and habitually showed himself disposed to goodness, mercy, and forgiveness, to active, liberal, self-denying love, evidently lived and "walked in the light" of the gospel, and was influenced by the inward efficacy of the truths which he professed: and there was nothing in the general prevailing disposition of his heart, by means of which Satan could succeed in tempting him to scandalous sins; or which was likely to prove an occasion of his throwing stumblingblocks in the way of others, to their destruction. Whereas, he who hated, or bare habitual malice, against his brother, or any man, was "still in darkness:" and as men walking in the dark know not whither they are going, nor at what they stumble; so such a person would proceed in an ignorant, uncertain, and unholy manner, not aware of the danger which beset his path, nor sensible that it led to destruction: "because the darkness" of error and sin "had blinded his eyes:" till at length he would fall into some destructive heresy, or scandalous crime, and not only ruin himself, but cause others to fall likewise. (Notes, Prov. 4:18,19. Jer. 13:15—17. John 12:34. —36.)—Walketh in darkness. (11) Note, 1:5—7.

V. 12—14. The apostle had before addressed Christians in general, as "his little children," or, his dear children; but here he spoke of such as were young in years, or newly converted; and distinguished them from those who were further advanced in the life of faith and grace. He particularly addressed his exhortations to those "new-born babes, who had tasted that the Lord is gracious:" (Note, 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) because their sins were as certainly forgiven them, for the sake of Christ, and through faith in his name, as those of their r are established and experienced brethren were: though their weakness of faith, and want of distinct and exact knowledge, might prevent them from possessing the abiding comfort of it: (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Luke 7:44—50. 24:44—49. Rom. 4:6—8.) and the counsel, which he was about to give them, would preserve them from many snares and sorrows, enable them to obtain the assurance of acceptance, and direct them in making a suitable return for so invaluable a benefit. He wrote also to "the fathers;" as about to give the same counsel and admonitions to those Christians who were "old disciples," matured in knowledge and experience, and who ought to be the guides and examples to their juniors, as well as to "shine as lights in the world." (Note, Acts 21: 15,16.) These had "known him, who was from the beginning:" (Note, 1:1,2.) and their long acquaintance with Christ, and with the eternal Father in him; with all their discoveries of his glory, and experience of his love, truth, and power, should engage them to simple dependence, lively gratitude, fervent love, devoted obedience, steady confidence in God, and zeal for his honour and that of the gospel.—Moreover, he wrote to the same effect to "the young men," who had for some time professed the gospel, and had passed through the state of childhood, but were not arrived at that maturity in grace, to which "the fathers" had attained. These he addressed and exhorted, from the consideration that "they had overcome the wicked one:" they had successfully encountered the first trials and temptations which attended their separation from sin, and renunciation of the world; and had overcome the assaults of Satan, by giving up their secular interests, breaking off their bad habits and connexions, and "entering in at the strait gate" of true conversion. (Notes, Matt. 7:13,14. Luke 13:22—30.) As they had, therefore, thus far "conquered the wicked one;" who had tried all methods in vain, to keep them from embracing the gospel, and giving themselves up to the service of Christ: they ought to go forth in his strength, aspiring after further victories; and endeavouring to spend the vigour of their spirits, or the prime of their years, in the services to which they were called, for the honour of Christ and the benefit of the church; and not in seeking worldly advantages. But, in order to give his exhortation the greater emphasis, the apostle again addressed the different descriptions of Christians; and admonished "the little children," as those "who had known the Father," and had already experienced his parental compassion and love for them; for which they were called to make the due returns of filial confidence, submission, gratitude, and obedience. (Note, John 14:7—14.) The address to "the fathers" exactly coincides with that which went before. To the young men he added, that they "were strong" in faith, hope, love, and all holy affections; they were in the prime of their fitness for active service, to which the mature experience of old age might be less adapted: and as "the word of God," which they had received when they were converted, abode in them, which appeared by their victory over the temptations of Satan; so it ought to be manifested in its effects, by their increasing fruitfulness in all good works. (Note, John 15:6—8.)—It does not appear that the clause, "have known him that is from the beginning," has any reference to the personal knowledge of Christ as Man: but is used as the other clause, "have known the Father," of knowing him by faith and experience. For on the earliest date assigned to the epistle, only a few aged Christians, and those principally the inhabitants of Galilee and Judea, could have personally known Jesus Christ; yet the apostle speaks of all the aged Christians whom he addressed, without any limitation.

V. 15—17. The general counsel and exhortation, which the apostle meant to enforce on all the persons above described, was this, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world."—The world, as God created it, is very good, and a proper object of a measure of love, as his work and for his sake: but as sin has marred it, our affections ought to be wholly alienated from it. The men of the world, as distinguished from believers, are enemies of God and subjects of Satan: we are therefore required to renounce their friendship, to avoid intimate society with them, and to abhor their ungodly principles and practices; while we pity their miseries, love their persons, and try to do them good. (Note, Jam. 4:4—6.) The things of the world may be desired, possessed, and valued, for those uses and purposes which were intended by God when he created them, and in subordination to his favour, authority, and glory; but for those purposes to which sin has perverted them, and sinners idolize them, we must not desire, seek, or value them, in any measure or manner: and if any man thus "love the world, the love of the Father is not in him;" his idol has never been dethroned, his heart remains unchanged, he is not reconciled to God through Jesus Christ, and has no true filial love of him in his heart. (Notes, Matt 6:24. Luke 14:25—33. Gal. 1:3—5. 6: 11—14.) For "all that is in the world," as thus idolized, and abused by men, who seek their happiness from it and not from God, may be summed up under three heads: First, Such things as are suited to excite and gratify "the lust of the flesh," or the irregular, inordinate, and polluting hankerings and cravings of the carnal heart and the animal appetites after gross sensual gratifications, as if man's happiness consisted in them. Secondly, Those things which are suited to excite and gratify "the lust of the eyes;" or the desires of the carnal heart after the possessions, embellishments, decorations, and enjoyments, which the eye is apt to look at with coveting, and inordinate desire of obtaining: such as treasures of gold and silver, or precious stones, jewels, houses, lands, gardens, stately mansions, elegant furniture and equipages, pictures, statues, curiosities, costly garments; and in short all that wealth can purchase, which gratifies the beholder's eye, or his other senses, (as music, or perfumes,) but is not directly to be considered as gross animal indulgence. Thirdly, "The pride of life," or those titles and dignities, that authority and honour, celebrity, renown, that reputation and splendour, which form the summit of earthly exaltation, and the highest prize in the poor lottery of this present life, to which the pride and ambition of man's apostate nature can aspire; and the greatest gratification of that mental con upiscence, which is congenial to the old temptation, "Ye shall be as gods." (Note, Gen. 3:4,5.) For a poor vainglorious worm to be advanced to such dominion over his fellows, or to possess such honour among them; as to be tempted to forget his own mortality, as well as his Creator and Judge; and to be so surrounded with vassals, attendants, and flatterers, or so emblazoned with high-sounding titles, and incumbered with magnificence, as to have nothing on earth which he can behold above him, or equal to him, and thus to disregard him that is "higher than the highest:" this is the perfection of "the pride of life." And all pre-eminence and distinction above others partakes of the same nature, whether power, splendour, or renown, on any account, be the immediate source of it. All these things (to which every earthly object, which any man is tempted to put in competition with the will, favour, and glory of God, must be referred) are "not of the Father:" this idolatrous desire of created things, did not attach to them, or to man, as God made them and him; they do not consist with his prescribed use of them; they are not bestowed for these purposes; nor do the men, who are his children and influenced by his grace, desire, seek, or use them in this manner. But "they are of the world," as "lying under the wicked one:" these desires after created things, and this use of them, are the effects of man's apostacy and subjection to Satan; they are thus made the baits by which men are seduced into sin, and kept in rebellion against God, and the incentives to all their vile passions. (Note, and P. O. Matt. 4:8—11.) They suit the taste, and form the supreme good, of worldly men, and are their only portion; and for the sake of them the whole earth is filled with violence, fraud, crimes, and misery. (Notes, Ex. 20:3. Rom. 8:5—9.) But "the world passeth away, and the lust of it:" all its pleasures, treasures, honours, and splendour will soon vanish for ever; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:23—25.) one generation after another of those who have coveted, possessed, and gloried in them, vanishes, and passes away into an eternal world: (Notes, Luke 16:19—26.) those who lust for them, and idolize them, will be eternally disappointed and miserable. But the man, "who doeth the will of God," as revealed to sinners by the gospel, will abide for ever in the possession and enjoyment of that substantial good, which he has been enabled to make choice of. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. Luke 10:38—42. 11:27,28.)—It is evident, that the apostle did not speak of the lawful, moderate, subordinate, and holy use, possession, or desire of God's good creatures, for the ends to which he has appointed them; but of the unlawful, inordinate, unholy, and idolatrous hankering after them, and valuation of them, to which in one form or other all men are totally addicted, so long as they remain in an unregenerate state.—Many vain efforts have been made, by limitations, distinctions, and exceptions, to evade the force of this passage; and some have written on it, as if they meant to show how far we might safely be carnally minded, "and lovers of the world:" but, in the apostle's evident meaning, we are no more allowed to love the world at all, than we are to worship Dagon; for we cannot "serve God and Mammon;" or love the Lord, and "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life." A man may carry on any business, fill any station, or possess any wealth, as the servant and steward of God, according to his commandments, for his glory, and for the good of mankind; and he may desire food and raiment, and things suitable to his rank in life, and use them with thankfulness, temperance, and humility: but he cannot love or desire them, to gratify his sensuality, pride, avarice, or ambition, or seek his happiness in them, without being an idolater. Every regenerate man is delivered from the dominion and allowed indulgence of "the love of the world;" and strives and prays against the remains of it, as it rises in his heart, or breaks forth into his life: he desires to love God perfectly, and seek all his happiness from him alone: and to love all other things in him, for his sake, and as his bounty; and to use them in submission to his precepts and providence. In proportion as men get this victory over the world, the reality of their grace is evidenced, and they are prepared for labouring and suffering in the cause of Christ: but unless it is begun in the heart, a man "has no root in himself," and he will either fall away in time of temptation, or remain a mere unfruitful professor of Christianity. (Notes, 5:4,5. Matt. 13:18—23. Rom. 12:2.)

V. 18, 19. The love of the world, as unsubdued in professed Christians, gave Satan his greatest advantage, not only in tempting them to open apostacy, but also in seducing them by destructive heresies; through which they were enabled to reconcile a quiet conscience with a carnal mind, and the indulgence of their favourite passion, under the mask of a religious profession. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. Acts 5:1—11. 8:18—24. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) So that the transition was natural, from warning Christians against the love of the "world," to putting them upon their guard against false teachers. The apostle, therefore, showed his beloved children, especially such of them as were young and inexperienced; that it was "the last time," or the last dispensation which God intended to introduce on earth, under which he would establish the kingdom of his Son, on the ruins of the usurped dominion of Satan; and this kingdom of Christ should continue, "till all enemies were put under his feet." But they had all heard, both from the predictions of ancient prophets, and from those of Christ and his apostles, that under this dispensation antichrist should arise. For Satan would not only oppose the gospel by exciting persecutions, but also by corruptions of the faith; and, especially by one great enemy to the Person, truth, authority, and glory of Christ, he would obtain immense power and influence in the visible church. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2: 3—12.) As St. Paul had declared that this "mystery of iniquity did already work;" so John observed that "there were many antichrists," or opposers of the pure gospel of the Lord Jesus; whose character, principles, intentions, and machinations, were of the same stamp, as those of the great antichrist would be, and who were evidently his forerunners. By this they might "know that it was the last time;" and that while God was specially exerting his power, by means of faithful ministers, to honour his Son; the devil and his servants were peculiarly active in endeavouring to defeat the beneficent design. (Notes, 1 Tim. 4:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:1—9. 4: 1—5.) These antichrists did not arise from among such as had before been avowed unbelievers: but they were professed Christians, who separated from the church, and became leaders of heretical sects, contrary to the doctrine of the apostles, and derogatory to the honour of Christ. "They went out from" the disciples, having been admitted to outward fellowship with them; but they had not "been of them," as regenerated persons, and living members of the body of Christ: for if this had been the case, they "would have continued with them;" as the Lord would not have "sent them a strong delusion," but would "have put his fear into their hearts, that they should not depart from him," according to the engagement of his everlasting covenant to all true believers. (Notes, 5:16—18. Jer. 32:39—41. John 10:26—31. Rom. 8:28—39. 2 Thes. 2:8—14. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) As, however, they had not "received the love of the truth," along "with the knowledge of it;" (Note, Heb. 10:26,27.) they had been left to the pride and lusts of their hearts, and to the artifices of Satan, to be deceived into fatal heresies, and to separate from the churches of Christ; that it might evidently appear, that those who professed the gospel were not all true disciples. Thus the church was purified; and true Christians were approved, and rendered more watchful and humble; whilst the distinction between them and hypocrites was more strongly marked. (Notes, Matt. 3:11,12. John 15:2—8. 1 Cor. 11:17—22.)—Some explain "the last time," to mean the last age of the Jewish church: but, probably, that had been subverted some years, when St. John wrote this epistle. The deceivers, predicted by our Lord, (Note, Matt. 24:23—25.) were men who falsely professed to be the promised Messiah, or to point him out to others; they had never constituted a part of the Christian church, and had not therefore apostatized; they were "false Christs" and "false apostles," not antichrists.—Indeed it is very unreasonable to interpret antichrist in the singular, to mean the same as the "many antichrists" afterwards mentioned; and then to confine the whole, either to the Jewish opposers or Judaizing corrupters of Christianity, as some do, or to the Gnostics, as divided into different sects, as others do. "Antichrist" signifies, one that opposes Christ, whether he oppose the doctrine of his deity, or his humanity; or whether he set himself against him, in respect of his priestly office, by substituting other methods of atoning for sin, and finding acceptance with God; his kingly office, by claiming authority to enact laws, in his church, contrary to his laws, or to dispense with his commandments; or his prophetical office, by claiming authority to add to, alter, or take away from the revelation which he has given in his holy word.—'They oppose the person of Christ, or his doctrine, or both together.' Beza. In this view, there were at an early period of the church, "many antichrists:" and the heads of any sect of heretics might be, in a subordinate sense, so called, but the direct and avowed opposers of Christianity could not be meant in this place. "They went not out from them."—The term is used in this epistle, and in St. John's second epistle, and in no other part of Scripture, not even in the Revelation: so that, all the controversies concerning "ANTICHRIST," as predicted by Daniel, and by St. John in the Revelation, are merely disputes about a word, and do not at all pertain to the main subject. (Notes, Dan. 7: 8: 11: Rev. 13: 14:) The "antichrists," mentioned in these verses, evidently were persons who had already appeared; but one distinguished antichrist was yet to be expected.—"They went out from us," that is, 'they went out from the apostles in Judea.' Whitby. "But they were not of us:" this must mean, that they were not of us, the apostles. It does not, however, appear that they even professed to be apostles; nor does it appear, that they had previously been teachers in the church. And can it possibly be imagined, that all, either the "false Christs," or "the antichrists," spoken of by our Lord, and by John, had been personally joined in communion with the apostles, while they continued in Judea?

Antichrist. (18) Αντιχριστος. 22. 4:3. 2 John 7. (Notes, 20—25. 4:1—3.)—From us. (19) Εξ ἡμων. The same preposition is afterwards rendered "of us." They belonged to us, in one sense, as the unfruitful branches to the vine; but not in another: "they were not all clean." (Notes, Matt. 22:11—14. 25:1—13. John 13:6—11. 15:3—5.) But they professed Christianity, and had been admitted to communion with true Christians; yet their subsequent apostacy proved that, like Judas, they had from the first been hypocrites. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. John 6:66—71.)—They would no doubt have continued.] Μεμενηκεισαν αν. They had indeed continued. The words do not readily admit of a strictly literal translation. No doubt, added by the translators, shows how they understood them.

V. 20—25. The apostle wrote to his fellow-Christians, to caution, comfort, and establish them; though his observations were also calculated to put all, who professed the gospel, on self-examination, and to preserve new converts from self-deception. They, however, whom he peculiarly addressed, had "an unction from the Holy One;" they were anointed by the Spirit, as sent forth, through Christ "the Holy One of God," to illuminate, sanctify, and consecrate them, to be a spiritual priesthood unto the Father. (Notes, Ps. 45:6—8 Is. 59:20,21. 61:1—3. 2 Cor. 1:21,22. Heb. 1:8,9.) By his teaching and influences they "knew all things," relating to the grand doctrines of Christianity, in a spiritual and experimental manner; so that no "antichrist" could fatally delude them. (Note, 5:16—18.) He had not therefore written to them, "because they did not know the truth;" for if he had addressed persons of that description, it would have been requisite for him to discuss his subject more copiously: but he had written to them, because they "did know the truth;" and that no lie belonged to it, or could consist with it. This general self-evident proposition was not more certain, than the particular application of it to the delusions of the seducers; whose false doctrines could not proceed from the same source with the truth of God. For "who was a liar," but the man who denied that Jesus "was the Christ?" Some of these heresiarchs denied the deity of Christ: others explained away his incarnation, and so denied his humanity, and the reality of his sufferings; and some opposed his kingly authority. Thus, whilst they retained the name of Christians, they virtually denied his Person, as "the Christ, the Son of God," and "the Son of man; Emmanuel, God with us;" (Notes, Is. 7:14. Matt. 1:22,23.) or his offices, as the anointed Prophet, Priest, and King of his church: they denied that "God was manifested in the flesh,' to "ransom the church with his own blood:" (Notes, Acts 20:28. 1 Tim. 3:16.) that in virtue of his one oblation, he might appear in the presence of God, as our great High-Priest, and reign over his redeemed people, as his willing subjects, to the end of the world, and for ever. Now, whether they denied his divine or his human nature, his atonement or his authority; they virtually denied him to be the Christ; as they who had "the unction of the Holy Spirit" would readily perceive. Such a teacher was, therefore, in fact, "an antichrist," who "denied both the Father and the Son;" seeing the Father can only be known, approached, worshipped, and glorified by sinners, in and through his incarnate Son; and they who "honour not the Son, honour not the Father that sent him." (Notes, Matt. 11:25—27. John 5:20—23.) The denial of the Son is, therefore, a denial of the Father: and the Supreme Being, the supposed Deity, which ancient or modern deniers of the personal or mediatorial honour of the Son, have professed to worship, is in fact the creature of their own imagination, and not the wise, just, holy, merciful, and faithful "God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." He, therefore, who "denies the Son, has not the Father" as his God, his Friend, and his Portion; but he who, in true faith, "acknowledges the Son, hath the Father also."—This last clause is printed in Italics, because it is wanting in most copies of the Greek Testament: yet it is found in several manuscripts; so that Beza and many other able critics look on it as genuine.—As these things were so, the apostle exhorted his beloved children, to let "that abide in them," and sink deep into their hearts, which they had heard from the beginning of their profession of the gospel, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ; for if the doctrine, which they had at first heard from the apostles and evangelists, remained in them, practically and efficaciously; they also would continue in union and fellowship with the Son, and with the Father through him. (Notes, 3—6. 1:3,4. John 15:1—8. 17:22,23.) They ought also to remember, for their encouragement, and confirmation against the artifices of false teachers, that the promise, which God had irreversibly given to all true believers, engaged to them eternal life and felicity, and all things pertaining to it. (Notes, 5:11—13. John 5:24—27. 11:20—27. Rom. 5:20,21. 6:21—23. Tit. 1: 1—4.)

V. 26—29. These admonitions the apostle wrote to his beloved children concerning those false teachers, who attempted to seduce them; and who had prevailed with many, that had once appeared as belonging to their company. He meant to caution and fortify them against the specious insinuations of deceivers: but in respect of real believers, "the anointing," which they had received of Christ, abode in them, as an incorruptible principle of life, and light, and spiritual discernment: so that they needed not that any man should teach them, except "as that same anointing taught them," and by "stirring up their pure minds in the way of remembrance;" or by confirming them in it, or enabling them to distinguish it, from all counterfeits: for by this teaching of God himself they were instructed in all things essential to salvation, and could not be fatally deluded. (Notes, Is. 54:11—14. Jer. 31:31—34. John 6:41—46. 1 Thes. 4:9—12. Rev. 3:18,19.) Now this teaching was altogether "truth, and no lie;" they could not, therefore, change the doctrine, which they had thus received from apostles and evangelists, under the teaching of the holy Spirit, for any new doctrine, without deviating from the truth into falsehood. This the deceivers aimed at: whereas, the apostle only sought to establish them in the truth, which had been "preached to them, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven;" and, indeed, those who had thus been taught, would "abide in him," or in it; in Christ or in the truth of his gospel. [o]He therefore needed only to exhort them, with all parental affection, "to abide in him," or in Christ: for the apostle's mind, being full of warm affections towards his beloved Lord, spoke frequently of him, by a pronoun without an antecedent, and so without naming him. (Note, John 20: 11—17.)—Let them then adhere steadfastly to the truth of the gospel; live in a constant dependence on Christ by faith for every thing; attend diligently on his ordinances, and yield a loving simple obedience to his commandments. Thus they might be assured, that when he should "appear to judge the world;" they would not be ashamed, as all hypocrites and apostates would be: but would "have confidence before him," as his approved servants, at this his second coming, and amidst all the solemn and important events of that decisive season. (Notes, Is. 28:16. 45:15—17,23—25. Dan. 12: 2,3. Rom. 5:3—5.) In this, the apostle joined himself; intimating, that he took the same method of preparing for the coming of his Lord and Judge, which he recommended to them; and that their "abiding in Christ" would then increase his confidence and joy. (Note, Phil. 2:14—18.)—As Christians could not but know, that Jesus, their Lord and Saviour, was righteous; (Note, 1,2.) so they might be assured, that all, who habitually practised righteousness, as what they loved and delighted in, "were born of him," by the regeneration of his Spirit, and were the children of God and the heirs of heaven. So that, "abiding in Christ, and bringing forth much fruit" by working righteousness, was the proper method of preparing to meet him in judgment with confidence and joy. (Note, 3:18—24.)—The expression, "born of him," which is here most obviously interpreted of Christ, concerning whom the apostle was speaking, and thus becoming "the sons of God," (3:1.) clearly shows what John believed concerning his Lord: and also that the same individual act is ascribed to God, (5:1.) to Christ, (29) and to the Holy Spirit. (John 3:5. Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 8:18. 9:6,7. 53:9,10. Heb. 2:10—13.)—The quakers, and some others, have inferred, from the language of the twenty-seventh verse, that a stated ministry is not necessary in the church: as true believers, being "anointed by the Spirit," need not such teaching: 'but it may be of moment to observe, that the Christian ministry was in the highest repute in the church, when the gifts of the Spirit were poured down upon it in the greatest abundance.' Doddridge.—The papists, on the other hand, adhering to the outward form, and the opus operatum, (in which they have too many followers, among nominal protestants,) ground their chrism or anointing with oil, upon it, which is applied in several ways: but is only an appointed shadow of the true "unction from the Holy One;" yet alas, it is too plain, that numbers seizing on this shadow, come short of the substance.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The gospel, when well understood and duly received, sets the heart against all sin, and effectually prevents the allowed practice of it; at the same time, that it gives the most blessed relief to the wounded consciences of those who have sinned, by the hope of pardon, through our "Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous," and his all-sufficient propitiation. Thus the divine original of the Scriptures is evinced, by the complete suitableness of the remedy proposed in them, to the actual state of men in this evil world: while all other schemes are founded on false principles; and therefore are totally inapplicable to the case, and cannot effectually bring peace to the conscience, and lead the heart to abhor all iniquity.—While we seek for grace, to make a holy use of the intercession and atonement of our heavenly Advocate, and encourage our fellow-Christians to do the same; we should remember, that "He is the propitiation, not for our sins only, but for those of the whole world;" and therefore, if any sinner, in any part of the earth, be willing to accept of this salvation, he will surely be made partaker of it: and we should desire and endeavour, by all the scriptural means in our power, to be the instruments of bringing others to share with us in so precious a benefit: and of sending the gospel to all nations.—But we should carefully guard against every sentiment which tends to pervert the abundant provision of the gospel for the forgiveness of our sins, into an encouragement to disobedience: "Hereby we know that we know Christ, if we keep his commandments:" and "he is a liar, and the truth is not in him," who professes to know him, and does not habitually obey him. What then shall we say to the unguarded language of some persons who have argued, or asserted, that sanctification is not the proper ground of assurance, and the evidence of our justification; and that it is legal or self-righteous, for men to look to their works, as the proof of their being true believers? We can only say, that they directly contradict the apostle, and that therefore they are most certainly mistaken. "Whoso, then, keepeth the word of Christ, in him verily is the love of God perfected." By this apostles knew that they were in Christ, and by the same means we must know it of ourselves also, if we would not deceive ourselves. He, therefore, "that saith he abideth in Christ, ought himself so to walk, even as he walked;" and no competent judge will believe his assertion, if his spirit and conduct habitually be contrary to those of his Lord; for at last he, who has most closely copied Christ's example, will be found to be the best Christian, and to have best demonstrated his faith to be living, and his love sincere.

V. 7—11. The things above spoken are "no new commandments" or declarations, but the same which all the disciples of Christ have heard from the beginning; though some affect to treat them as novelties, even as others do the peculiar doctrines of a gratuitous salvation. But Christianity, instead of rendering "the love of God" and men, and good works, superfluous and unnecessary, furnishes us with new motives, and lays us under further obligations to abound in them; and it gives us new directions concerning the love of our neighbours, by requiring love to our brethren for Christ's sake, and to our enemies after the example of his love to us. These things are true and important, according to his conduct towards his redeemed people, and their peculiar privileges and oblations, "because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth;" and we must remember that hatred of the brethren or of neighbours, and the prevalence of any malignant passion, is proportionably a proof that a man is still in darkness. The degree of our holy love is the proper criterion and standard of our illumination; as well as the best preservative from sin, and the most active principle of obedience. He who "loveth his brother" most fervently, with a pure heart, abides in the clearest light, and will be best kept from stumbling, or from occasioning the falls of others; but he, who is of a violent, selfish, and malicious temper, however he may boast of his knowledge, walks in darkness, and is in the road to destruction; though he be not at all aware whither he is going, because "the darkness," and the prince of darkness, "have blinded his eyes." (Note, Matt. 6:22,23.) These things demand our closest attention, and most serious self-examination: and should lead us earnestly to pray, that God would show us what we are, and whither we are going.

V. 12—17. When there is real "faith that worketh by love," even "little children" and weak believers may be assured, that "their sins are forgiven them" for the sake of Christ: and though there are different degrees of growth, strength, knowledge, and grace, among "the sons and daughters of the Lord almighty;" and some of them have obtained more victories over the wicked one, or are more fit for active service, or to give wise counsel, than others are; yet they are all alike dear to their heavenly Father. They all receive

CHAPTER III.

The apostle breaks out in admiration of the love of God, in making us his children, and giving us present privileges with the hope of an inconceivable felicity; and shows that all who have this hope "purify themselves as he is pure," 1—3. He shows how the children of God, and the children of the devil, may be distinguished, 4—10. He exhorts his readers to "love one another," contrasting this love with the example of Cain, and warning them to expect the hatred of the world, 11—13. He points out "the love of the brethren," as the distinguishing evidence of conversion; explains the nature and effects of it, contrasting it with enmity and selfishness; and enforces the practice of it, by the example of Christ, 14—17. He exhorts his readers to love "in deed and in truth;" and shows that confidence in God is connected with the consciousness of upright obedience, 18—24.

BEHOLD [a]what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, [b]that we should be [c]called the sons of God! therefore [d]the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not.

2 Beloved, [e]now are we the sons of God, and [f]it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that [g]when he shall appear, [g]we shall be like him; [h]for we shall see him as he is.

3 And [i]every man that hath this hope in him, [k]purifieth himself, [i]even as he is pure.

"knowledge of him," and love to him; and through "his word abiding in them," he will lead forth the young ones of his family to the same victories, and train them up to a measure of the same vigour and maturity to which others have already attained. But all, who would share these blessings, must be careful "not to love the world," or any of its polluting vanities. This idolatry, remaining unsubdued in the hearts of many professors of the gospel, occasions their apostacy or total unfruitfulness: and, through some remains of it, numbers are kept from comfort and assurance; their spiritual life continues low and feeble; they are mere babes, or dwarfs, to the end of their days, and enter eternity before they obtain any comfortable satisfaction what their eternal state will be! (Note, Heb. 4:1,2.) Indeed, "all that is in the world," as apostate, and so the kingdom of the devil, is diametrically opposite to the holiness, spirituality, temperance, humility, and lowliness of Christianity; its pleasures, interests, pomps, and honours, can only excite and strengthen the propensities of our fallen nature; which it is our great business and interest to subdue and crucify. The pursuit, acquisition, or enjoyment of them, tends only to pollution and condemnation; they are soon "passing away," to be possessed no more, and he who has nothing more enduring will ere long want a drop of water to cool his tongue, and be unable to procure it; whilst the portion of him "who doeth the will of God shall be for ever." (P. O. Luke 16:19—26.) Yet are these vanities so alluring to the remains of corruption in our hearts, that without constant watching and prayer, we cannot escape or obtain victory over the world, and him who is "the god" and prince of it.

V. 18—25. Those who have been delivered from that original and universal idolatry, "the love of the world, and the things in the world," will be less liable to be deceived by the seductions of those "many antichrists," who in every age and place endeavour to corrupt the gospel, and to oppose the honour and cause of Christ. Many thus go out from the society of Christians, but they never were true believers; for if they had belonged to that blessed company, "they would no doubt have continued with them:" nay, in fact, "damnable heresies" as much try the faith of nominal Christians, as furious persecutions do. "The unction from the Holy One" alone can teach that knowledge, which will surely preserve a man from all delusions: and when we are thus established in the great truths of the gospel; we shall know "that no lie is of the truth;" and shall therefore disregard the eloquence, learning, ingenuity, and confidence, of those who contradict the Bible; and be satisfied with opposing the express testimony of the truth itself, to their well varnished and ably defended falsehoods. We shall in this manner most clearly perceive, that every man is an antichrist, who denies the Person, or any of the offices of Christ; and that in denying the Son, he denies the Father also, and has no part in his favour, while he rejects his great salvation. Candour and liberality of sentiment are good words; bigotry, fanaticism, and a contracted mind, sound very harsh: but let us not aspire to the reputation of liberality, or desire to escape reproach, more than the apostles did. While we judge favourably of all who trust in Christ as a divine Saviour, and obey his word; let us pity and pray for those deluded men, who deny the deity and atonement of Christ, and the work of his new creating Spirit; protest against their antichristian doctrine, and refuse all needless intercourse with them. (Note, 2 John 7—11.) Let that abide in all, who have professed the gospel, or would be deemed Christians, which was taught to the primitive disciples; that they may "continue in the Son and in the Father," and that the blessed promise of eternal life may belong to them also.

V. 26—29. The subjects above treated on are peculiarly needful at this day, concerning "those who seduce" the professed disciples of the Saviour, and would persuade them, that it is of no consequence what they believe, concerning his Person or doctrine. This fashionable species of infidelity directly contradicts the whole word of God, and in fact does its utmost to antiquate the Bible, as a useless book, in this age of wisdom and illumination.—We should desire to teach no man any thing, except what the Holy Spirit has taught us in his word, to which our appeal must be made: and "the same Spirit teaches all those," who partake of his sacred anointing, the grand truths of the sacred word, though they be left to differ in less essential matters. May we then ask and receive from Christ more and more of "his anointing," to "abide in us," and to illuminate our minds in the truth, unmixed with error; that we may abide in it, even as they did, who of old adhered to the doctrine of the holy apostles and let all, who profess the truth, and appear to have come to Christ, abide in him; without listening to the suggestions of any modern illuminators of mankind: that when our judge "shall appear," we may all, with prophets and apostles "have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming." Yet let us be equally careful not to "hold the truth in unrighteousness;" but remember that they only "are born of God," who bear his holy image, and walk before him in his most righteous ways. But what numbers have been baptized who do not thus practise righteousness, nay, who are grossly workers of iniquity!

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—3. (Note, John 1:10—13.) The apostle having declared, that "they who do righteousness are born of God," (2:29.) here breaks out into a joyful and admiring view of the love of the eternal Father, in having bestowed on them the unspeakable honour and felicity of being "called his sons," or children. What manner of love was this! By what words could it be described? Whether his majesty, purity, and justice, or their guilt, meanness, pollution, and misery, were considered; whether the blessing conferred on them, or the method in which it was bestowed, were contemplated; the "love of the Father" in it must be adored, as passing knowledge and comprehension. (Notes, 4:9—12. John 3:16. Rom. 5:6—10.) Indeed "the world" of ungodly men, among whom "the children of God" lived, commonly in poverty, affliction and contempt, would not acknowledge their claim, approve their character, or desire their privileges: but this was the effect of their ignorance of God, and contemptuous alienation from his holy excellence; so that, when "the only begotten Son of the Father, full of grace and truth," appeared on earth, "they knew him not," but rejected, despised, and crucified him. (Notes, John 1:1—3. 17:25,26.) But, whatever the world thought of true believers: even in their afflicted condition on earth, they were the children of God, regenerate, adopted into his family, the special objects of his love, and the heirs of his kingdom: and how many or heavy soever their trials were, their almighty Father would surely protect, provide for, comfort, and bless them. (Note, Rom. 8:14—17.) It did not indeed "then appear," what, or how glorious, they would at length be: nor could even the beloved apostle frame an adequate conception of heaven, and its ineffable felicities: for this would be ennobling and rapturous beyond all his thoughts. (Note, 1 Cor. 13:8—12.)—Yet believers knew in general, that "when He," even Christ, or God in human nature, should be manifested, his believing people would be made completely like him, both in the incorruptibility of their bodies, and the perfect holiness of their souls. (Note, Phil. 3:20,21.) For in the beatific vision, the eyes of the children of God shall "behold his glory in the Person of Christ," and their souls shall know his fulness and excellency, by immediate perception. This full view of "him, as he is," will complete the renewal of the divine image upon them, and for ever exclude all unholy affections; and thus they will be prepared for the consummate, unalloyed, and most felicitating enjoyment of God, in and through Jesus Christ, of which we can gain the most remote idea. (Note, 2 Cor. 3:17,18. 4:5,6.) But, wherever the regenerating Spirit of God had produced this genuine hope in a man's heart, it would certainly induce him to desire and follow after holiness, as the preparation for this final happiness, and the anticipation of it: (Notes, 1 Pet. 1:3—9.) for he, who "hoped," or trusted, "in God," that he would render him perfectly happy, by fully renewing him to the holy image of the divine Saviour, would also be fully convinced that his present comfort must bear proportion to his sanctification: the assurance that his labour in following after holiness would not be in vain, would also give energy to his endeavours. Nor would he ever rest satisfied with his attainments, so long as any sin remained in him: but he would use all means, and wait on God for the performance of his promises; till all his affections and powers were fully sanctified, all sinful passions destroyed, all holy dispositions perfected, and all his words and actions made conformable

5 And ye know that [p]he was manifested [q]to take away our sins; [r]and in him is no sin.

6 Whosoever [s]abideth in him sinneth not: [t]whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him. [Practical Observations.]

7 Little children, [u]let no man deceive you: [x]he that doeth righteousness is righteous, [y]even as he is righteous.

8 He [z]that committeth sin is of the devil; for [a]the devil sinneth from the beginning. For [b]this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil.

9 Whosoever is [c]born of God doth not commit sin; [d]for his seed remaineth in him; [e]and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.

10 In this [f]the children of God are manifest, [g]and the children of the devil: [h]whosoever doeth not righteousness, [i]is not of God, [k]neither he that loveth not his brother. [Practical Observations.] to those of his beloved Lord. As this can never be fully attained in the present life; the true Christian's diligence, in "purifying himself as Christ is pure," must be continued till death. (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:14—18. 7:1.) Then the soul will be admitted into his presence, and perfected in his likeness: but the complete conformity of the Christian to his Lord, in body and soul, will not be possessed till the general resurrection.—'He does not say "has purified," but "purifieth," that we may understand him to signify, following after holiness, not the perfect attainment of it.' Beza. (Note, 2 Cor. 7:1.)

V. 4—6. According to what had before been observed, they, who did not "follow after holiness," could not possess genuine hope in Christ, and in God through him, according to the gospel: but the apostle further remarked, that he, who "committed," or practised, "sin, transgressed also the law," or violated and directly opposed the authority and requirements of the moral law; for the ceremonial law cannot here be intended. Thus it was taken for granted, that the holy law of God was the rule of conduct to all his true servants; and that none of them, wilfully and habitually, did any thing contrary to it. For sin is "the transgression of the law," or a lawless conduct. Whatever in any degree exceeds, comes short of, or deviates from the law, and in thought, word, or deed, is not perfectly coincident with it, is sin, a violation of the law, and deserves death according to the covenant of works: but an habitual commission of sin tends to the destruction of the law and its authority, and can never be allowed of by any disciple of Christ. (Note, Jam. 2:8—13.) For they know that "he was manifested" in human nature, to take away the sins of his people, by atoning for their guilt, and by renewing them to his own holy image. (Notes, 7—10. John 1:29.) Moreover, "in him was no sin;" and the perfection of his holiness, and active obedience, both magnified the precept of the law, constituted him a proper Person to be a Sacrifice for sin, and was intended as an example to his people. Whoever, therefore, "abides in Christ," as one with him, and as maintaining communion with him, does not thus sin: and "whosoever sinneth," wilfully and habitually, has never seen the glory of Christ by faith, or had any experimental saving knowledge of him; for if he had, he would be transformed, in a measure, into the holy image of him, in whom "there was no sin."

V. 7—10. St. John here warned his beloved children, as the other apostles had before done; (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Gal. 6:6—10. Eph. 5:5—7. Jam. 1:22—25. 2 Pet. 1:8,9.) not to let any man deceive them by plausible pretences, into an opinion that they might live in habitual sin and yet be true Christians. For he, who "practised righteousness," as his business and delight, was a righteous man; and his conformity to Christ, (being "righteous as he was righteous,") was the proper evidence of his interest, by faith, in the obedience and propitiation of the divine Saviour. On the other hand, he who "committed sin," in his habitual conduct, was evidently of the devil's party, family, and disposition; as Satan was the first sinner, and had practised rebellion and iniquity "from the beginning," and had no pleasure in any thing else. But it must be impossible to imitate and adhere to the devil, and at the same time to be a disciple of Christ; seeing "the Son of God was manifested," for the single and express purpose of "destroying," abolishing, or undoing "the works of the devil," in behalf of all his people. (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Matt. 12:27—30. Mark 1:23—28. Heb. 2:14,15.)—He came to deliver them from that condemnation and slavery, into which the influence and temptation of Satan had reduced them and all mankind; and to restore them to the favour, image, and service of God. This was done, by atoning for their sins and pardoning them, and by "a new creation" of their souls to holiness: but while men lived habitually in pride, impiety, injustice, fraud, cruelty, malice, intemperance, or licentiousness, or in the neglect of a sober, righteous, and godly life; it could not be supposed that "the works of the devil" had been destroyed, or his fortifications in their hearts cast down, by the power of Christ. Consequently the end of his incarnation and humiliation had not been in any degree answered in respect of them; and therefore they could not be warranted to account themselves his disciples. For all who belonged to Christ had been "born of God;" (Notes, 2:26—29. John 1:10—13. 3:1—8.) and no one who was regenerate lived in the commission of any allowed sin: because "the incorruptible seed" of the word of God, being made to grow and live in his heart by the Holy Spirit, (Note, 1 Pet. 1:23—25.) remained in him, and rendered it impossible that he could sin with allowance, continuance, and satisfaction; even as a fish cannot live out of water, because it is out of its element, and can only languish and die, unless it be again put into it.—This must be all that the apostle's general words can mean: because if strictly taken so as to mean that the regenerate could not sin in any instance, (Notes, 4—6. 5:16—18. Rom. 6:1,2. Gal. 5:16—18.) they would not only prove that some men are perfect, but that all regenerate persons are incapable of sinning any more for ever: an inference which no man, who either reads the Bible or the history of mankind, will ever admit. (Note, 1:8—10.) General declarations of this kind, must always be explained, according to the argument of the sacred writer: otherwise an antinomian may prove, that "God justifies" those who are in every sense "ungodly," and who never do good works of any kind, or for any purpose, as long as they live: (Rom. 4: 4,5.) and a man who runs into the other extreme may prove, that all the children of God are perfectly sinless, and that no regenerate person can possibly fall into any sin. But Scripture must be explained by itself, and soberly; and the context evidently shows, that the apostle spoke of an allowed practice of some habitual sin: this he declared to be impossible to the regenerate, and a full proof of a man's being "the child of the devil." For in this especially "the children of God, and the children of the devil," were manifestly distinguished from one another: and he who did not "practise righteousness was not of God;" whatever his creed, profession, gifts, or experience might be: nay, this was to be carried to so great a strictness, that he who did not "love his brother," but showed a selfish, envious, and malignant spirit in his general conduct, was not to be accounted a child of God, but of the devil.—He that committeth sin is of the devil. (8) Note, John 8:41—47. 'It is not he who committeth one or more sins of infirmity; for so did Christ's disciples while they were with him; nor he who committeth one great sin, through the power of a strong temptation, of which he bitterly repents, and from which he returns to his obedience, for thus did David and St. Peter, who yet were not then the children of the devil: but they who comply with the lusts of Satan, and will do them. The other interpretations of these words, including the preceding verses, seem either vain and impertinent, or false and dangerous.' Withy.—Discordant ways of obviating the difficulty arising from attempting to establish the strictest literal meaning of the apostle's words, all being evidently unscriptural, serve to show that this was not intended.—1. The regenerate ought not to sin. Ought then others to sin? 2. When the regenerate sin they cease to be "children of God." Yet apostles say, "in many things we offend all." (Note, 1:8,10.) 3. They cannot sin as their 'sins are not imputed to them.' This deserves no answer.—'He that is born of God proposeth to himself a life as free from sin as possible, nor does he ever of his own accord employ himself in sin: if at any time, contrary to the purpose of his mind, he has offended, he does not persist in the same; but, acknowledging his fault, he speedily returns to his former plan of life, as soon and as much as he can.' Gataker.—As "doing righteousness" means, not a single action, but habitual obedience to God; "committing sin," cannot properly signify merely a single act of sin, but habitual disobedience, in some particular at least.—The word rendered "sinneth not," in this connexion, must signify the same as those translated "committeth not sin," and be explained by them.—"Doing righteousness," evidences that a man is righteous; that is, a justified believer: but the apostle does not say that it constitutes his righteousness; nor could he say this consistently with the tenor of the sacred Scriptures. "He that doeth righteousness is born of God;" it is the evidence and effect, and not the cause of his regeneration. (Notes, 2:26—29. 5:1—3.)

V. 11, 12. (Note, 1:5—7.) "The message," which had been delivered "from the beginning" to Christians, in the name of their Lord, had especially required them to "love one another," as the distinguishing evidence of being his disciples. (Notes, 2:7—11. John 13:31—35. 15:12—16.) They, therefore, who were manifestly destitute of this grace, ought not to be considered as true Christians; but should be ranked with Cain, who being a professed worshipper of God, showed himself to belong to the family of "that wicked one," the devil, by envying, hating, and murdering his brother Abel. (Notes, Gen. 4:1—15. P. O. Notes, Matt. 23:34—36. Heb. 11:4. Jude 11—13.) But for what cause did he commit this atrocious murder? What provocation had he received? What injury had been done him? None at all: but he hated the holy image of God in Abel, and the example of his humility, faith, and piety: he envied him, and was angry even with God for accepting his brother's oblation in preference to his; and so he was enraged to that degree, that he slew him, "because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous."

V. 13—15. The disposition of Cain naturally belonged to "the children of the devil;" some of whom had despised, hated, and crucified Christ for the same reason. Christians therefore ought not to wonder, "if the world hated them;" seeing the men of the world were in subjection to "the wicked one," and under his influence, as the children of his family. (Notes, John 7:3—10. 8:41—47. 15:17—21.) Indeed no Christian, who was well acquainted with the heart of man, could wonder at any effects of the contempt and enmity of ungodly people against "the children of God:" for it was the most unequivocal proof, that they themselves had passed "from death unto life," from that state of condemnation and spiritual death, in which they all once lay, into a state of life, and acceptance with God; when they were conscious that they "loved the brethren." (Note, John 5:24—27.) Humble, disinterested, active, liberal, and forgiving love of men in general, for the Lord's sake, is indeed a good evidence of regeneration: but it is manifest that the apostle spoke here especially of the love of believers towards their brethren in Christ, as such. "By nature the children of wrath even as others," they were disposed to hate, deride, revile, and injure those, who professed the truths of the gospel, bore the image of Christ, and were spiritual worshippers and servants of God through him: they had once perhaps been ready to deem them unsociable, precise, and troublesome enthusiasts or hypocrites, and to shun and dislike them as such. But, being "born of God," and having thus "passed from death unto life," they were made congenial with them in judgment and disposition; and thus they were brought to love, esteem, and honour them; to sympathize with them, and show them kindness; and to take pleasure in them, as the excellent of the earth. (Notes, Ps. 16:2,3. 119:57—63.) This affection for them was not entertained, on account of their belonging to the same party, or holding the same notions: but because it appeared to them that they loved Christ, bore his image, and were devoted to his service. Thus "they had purified their souls, in obeying the truth, through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren." (Note, 1 Pet. 1:22.) But, on the other hand, every one even of those who appeared to be Christians, who did not "love his brother" with cordial affection, and indeed every one of his neighbours with good-will, "abode still in death," condemned, and unregenerate. "For whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer;" that is, he has the heart of a murderer: and the pride, selfishness, envy and malice, which habitually rule in it, constitute "the root of bitterness," from which murder naturally springs: so that, if all restraints were removed, and suitable temptations interposed, the act of murder would infallibly be the consequence. And they "knew that no murderer had eternal life abiding in him;" that is, no one, who had habitually the heart of a murderer, and a disposition to perpetrate that crime, could be a regenerate person, or a "partaker of the Spirit of Christ." No doubt David, when in one dreadful instance he was guilty of complicated murder, had "eternal life abiding in him;" (Note, 2 Sam. 11:14—17.) nor is there any single sin, into which it is impossible for a regenerate man to fall. But the apostle was showing that no true believer could live in habitual sin: and he stated, that he who loved not his brother did in effect hate him; and he, who habitually hated his brother, was constantly of the temper of a murderer; that is, he bare the image, and was of the disposition of the devil, and therefore was one of his children, and not one of the children of a God of love.—What an awful view do the concluding words give of the state of those numbers, who habitually determine, by duelling, to attempt the commission of murder, whenever an occasion seems to call for it!—'The apostle does not say, that by loving our brethren, we are translated from death to life; ... but that we may "know that we have passed."' Beza. It is the evidence and effect, and not the cause. The state of death in sin and condemnation, in which all men are by nature, is here taken for granted, as an undeniable fact: (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Eph. 2:1—3.) and also that those who are "born of God" have "eternal life abiding in them," and may "know that they are passed from death unto life." (Note, 2:3—6.)—The true Christian, as such, is the brother, and the object of special affection to all believers: but men in general are our brethren, in Adam. So that hatred of any man, a brother by nature, proves the professed Christian unregenerate; but love of Christians especially, is, in this respect, the most indisputable proof of regeneration. (Notes, Matt. 25:34—46. P. O. 31—46.)

V. 16, 17. The effects of genuine love toward the brethren required to be ascertained: and this might be understood, by considering "the love of God" to sinners. The reality and immensity of his love were perceived, especially, in that he, Christ, as Emmanuel, "laid down his life" for his people, to atone for their sins and ransom their souls. (Note, 4:9—12.) Many copies read "love," and not "the love of God;" so that the same weight cannot be laid upon this passage, as on a similar one. (Note, Acts 20:28.)—If, however, this love of Emmanuel to lost sinners was duly considered, it must appear, that Christians were required, according to the perfection of their rule and example, to "lay down their lives for their brethren," when the case was urgent, and a proportionable good might be done by it: and therefore all inferior things ought surely to be given up for their benefit, whenever circumstances called for it. If then, a man "hath this world's good;" and possesses what is sufficient for his own necessary expenses, and has any thing to spare for indulgence, or to hoard; and "seeth his brother have need," through sickness seeth his brother have need, [e]and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, [f]how dwelleth the love of God in him? [Practical Observations.] calamity, or distress; yet, instead of cheerfully supplying his wants from his own plenty, "shuts up his bowels" from him, and stifles his compassionate feelings, through reluctance to be at the expense or self-denial of adequately relieving him, and so leaves him in want and misery; how can it be thought that the love of God abides in that man's heart? By what can it be known, that he has a true sense of the love of Christ for perishing sinners, when "he laid down his life for them?" or that the love of God has ever been planted in his heart by the Holy Spirit? seeing that the love of the world and of its goods, overcomes and chokes the risings of compassion to his suffering brother. (Note, 2:15—17.) Every instance and degree of this selfishness must weaken the evidence of a man's conversion: and when it is habitual and allowed, it must decide that he does not belong to God, but resembles Cain far more than Jesus Christ; seeing he would rather leave the children of God to suffer or die, than part with his money, or abridge his own indulgences, to alleviate their sorrows, or save their lives. This might also be deemed constructive murder; as such a man refused to preserve life, when it was in his power, and when it was his bounden duty to do it: and if the Lord had acted thus towards sinners and enemies, we must all have perished. (Notes, Prov. 24:11,12. Rom. 14:13—18. 1 Cor. 8:7—13.)—As no higher expression of love is mentioned, than a willingness to "lay down our lives for our brethren;" it is manifest that the apostle did not maintain the extravagant notion, that true grace will make us willing to be eternally miserable, for the glory of God, and the good of the universe!

This world's good. (17) Τον βιον του κοσμου. 2:16. Luke 21:4.—Not riches, but things needful, with a little to spare, are meant. (Note, Luke 3:10—14.)—Shutteth up.] Κλειση. Note, Ps. 77:5—12.

V. 18—24. From the preceding considerations, the apostle earnestly admonished his "dear children" to love one another, and their poor brethren and neighbours, "not in word, neither in tongue," or merely in profession, and with kind and obliging language; "but in deed and in truth," showing the sincerity and strength of their affection for them, by their actions, and in self-denying liberal communication to the supply of their wants. If they did this from faith in Christ, and love to him, they would "thereby know, that they were of the truth." (Note, Jam. 2:14—18.) These "fruits of the Spirit" would show that they held the truth in love, and experienced the power of it in their hearts: and so they would be able "to assure their hearts before God," in humble confidence of his acceptance; and enlarged expectations of having all their wants supplied, from the riches of his liberality. (Notes, 2 Cor. 9:8—11. Phil 4:14—20.) But they could not have this warranted assurance of his love, if they allowed themselves in known sin, or in the neglect of known duty: for if their own hearts and consciences should condemn them of secret wickedness, or of selfish disregard to the distresses of their brethren; they could not but know, "that God was greater than their hearts, and knew all things;" and the consideration of his perfect knowledge of all their sins, his holy hatred of them, his impartial justice and almighty power, must fill them with fears of his vengeance, and prevent their confidence in him. For if they could not but decide against themselves, when made judges in their own cause, notwithstanding their partial self-love, defective views of the odiousness of their sins, and their proneness to forget them and their aggravations; how could they hope to stand in judgment before the infinite God? (Note, Rom. 2:12—16.)—According to the law, and the covenant of works, every man's heart must "condemn him," in proportion as he knows the rule of duty, and examines himself by it. Even according to the gospel, his own heart must condemn of hypocrisy every man who lives in allowed, habitual sin: unless his conscience be seared, and God have given him up to be judicially blinded and hardened. Nay, when true believers are betrayed into any known sin, of omission or commission, they are arraigned at the tribunal of their own hearts, and condemned for it; and their confidence in God is weakened; till deep humiliation, and faith in the atoning blood for pardon, make way for the renewal of their peace, and the revival of their confidence: and [*] through more grievous declensions, their consciences lose this salutary, though painful sensibility; severe corrections will surely be employed, as the merciful means of preventing their total ruin. (Notes, 2 Sam. 11:27. Ps. 32:3—5.)—But, if the hearts of Christians do not condemn them of any allowed or unrepented sin, or neglect of duty; then have they confidence towards God, through "the Spirit of adoption," and by faith in their great High-Priest: and thus coming to "the throne of grace," they may ask what they will of their reconciled Father, and shall certainly receive it, if good for them. (Notes, 5:14,15. Ps. 37:4.) For their conduct evidences the reality of their repentance and faith; as they uprightly keep his commandments, and habitually "do those things that are pleasing in his sight." He has especially, in the gospel, commanded sinners to believe in his Son Jesus Christ, and to come to him, pleading his name and merits; that they may thus receive forgiveness of sins, and all the blessings of salvation; and that, for Christ's sake and after his example, they should love one another, in a forgiving, compassionate, liberal, and self-denying manner, even as Christ had given them commandment. He, therefore, who uprightly obeys these commandments, and others connected with them, is thus proved to "dwell in Christ," his Ark, Refuge, and Rest, and in the Father through him. (Notes, 4:13—17. 5:20,21. Ps. 90:1,2. 91:1,2. John 6:52—58. 15:3—5. 17:20,21. Rom. 8:1,2.) It is also manifest, that Christ dwells in him, as the Lord of his affections, and as exercising his power, and displaying his glory, in and by him: and it is known, that this mystical union subsists between Christ and their souls, "by the Spirit which he hath given them." (Notes, John 14:15—24. Gal. 2:17—21. Eph. 3:14—19.)—This could not relate exclusively to the miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit, which were no full proof of this gracious in-dwelling; (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) but to his new creating energy, producing holy love, and renewing the image of Christ on the soul, and "witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God." (Notes, Rom. 8:5—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. We can never sufficiently admire the love which "the Father hath bestowed upon us," or rejoice enough in our own felicity, if indeed we are numbered among "the children of God." Who and what were we, or what had we done, that the infinite Lord should condescend thus to notice and distinguish us! "What manner of love is this," that he should so redeem, regenerate, adopt, and bless such worthless worms, such guilty, polluted rebels! Doubtless it is vast beyond conception, and incapable of being illustrated by any comparison. May we then be "followers of him as his dear children;" and thus show our sense of his unspeakable mercy, and express that obedient, grateful, and humble mind, which becomes those who are so highly favoured and distinguished. Should the world disown us, and deride our pretensions of being "the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty," or even treat us with the utmost contempt, enmity, and cruelty, we may recollect "that the world by wisdom knew not God:" and that even his professed worshippers knew not "the Brightness of his glory, the express Image of his Person;" nay, they crucified him "whom all angels worship!" But as they could not exclude "the First-born" from his inheritance; so neither will they be able to prevent the eternal felicity of those whom he graciously owns as his brethren. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. John 20:11—17. Heb. 2:10—13.) Even in our lowest estate, and under our heaviest trials, "we are the children of God," if we indeed believe in Jesus Christ; and we shall experience such consolations, and possess such hopes, as will support us under our transient sorrows: but none on earth can conceive, in an adequate manner, the nature of "that exceeding and eternal weight of glory," into which we shall speedily enter. (Note, 2 Cor. 4:13—18.) It "doth not indeed yet appear what we shall be;" but enough is known to animate us to the conflict: for what more can the believer desire, than to behold his beloved Saviour "as he is," in all his inexpressible glory; to be perfected in his image filled with his love, and enabled to praise and serve him, in a man-

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle warns Christians against those who falsely professed to be inspired; and gives directions for distinguishing the Spirit of truth from that of error, 1—6. He exhorts them to "love one another," from the example of God in giving his Son for sinners; and from various considerations, tending to show the necessity, benefit, and efficacy of his sacred affection 7—21.

ner worthy of his infinite excellency, and his own immense obligations? But let none suppose that they possess "this hope in him," if they do not now desire, pursue, and practise holiness: for every man, without exception, in whose heart this hope is planted by the Holy Spirit, "purifieth himself," in dependence on the grace, and in contemplation of the glory of Christ, unto increasing conformity to his perfect purity. This distinguishes the living hope of God's children from the presumption of all kinds of hypocrites. The Redeemer did not "magnify the law and make it honourable," that his disciples might vilipend and despise it; but that they might be delivered from its righteous condemnation, and taught to obey and delight in its most holy and reasonable precepts. As "in him is no sin," so none who abide in him allow themselves in any transgression of the divine law: for "he, who committeth sin," has not seen or known Christ, and is miserably deluded if he thinks he has.

V. 7—10. In the vast concern of eternal happiness or misery, how careful should we be not to deceive ourselves! and the argument of the apostle in these verses, points out a way, in which many, it is to be feared, are self-deceived: for, however we interpret some expressions, they must prove, beyond all reasonable doubt, that they only are "righteous before God," as justified believers, who are taught and inclined and enabled, by "the renewal of the Holy Spirit," to practise universal righteousness, in the general tenor of their conduct; and that a man's conformity to the example of Christ, is the only adequate evidence of his being interested in his redemption. It should also be observed, that all who are not, as "regenerate," "the children of God," are "the children of the devil:" they copy the example "of him who sinneth from the beginning," and no doubt they will be heirs of his inheritance, if they die unchanged. (Note, Matt. 25: 41—46.) For "the Son of God was manifested to destroy the works of the devil;" so that they, in whose hearts the works of the devil are not destroyed, in any evident degree; but who still continue proud, selfish, sensual, malicious, envious, and alienated from the life of piety, purity, and righteousness, cannot have received the special benefit of his incarnation. [e] "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin:" nay, he cannot do it; for his new nature, the divine "seed, remaineth in him," and effectually hinders him: even unallowed deficiencies, or such transgressions as he may be sometimes betrayed into, give him the most poignant distress. It is indeed impossible, that he can live in known sin, or take any pleasure in such a course; because it is impossible to destroy the principle of divine life, and sensibility of conscience, which has been communicated by the regenerating Spirit; or to turn "the heart of flesh" again into an unfeeling "stone." (Notes, Ez. 11:17—20. 36:25—27.) "In this the children of God are manifested, and the children of the devil;" and "whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God." May all professors of the gospel lay these truths to heart, and examine themselves by them: and let all ministers be sure, as they will answer it before the Lord Jesus, at the day of judgment, to insist fully on these topics, and make them plain to their hearers. For numbers are most certainly "deceived by vain words;" "sin on, that grace may abound;" make the lamented fact, of a believer's liableness to be overcome by temptation, a palliation of their habitual wickedness; and hope for heaven, whilst living in the secret, nay, perhaps the open commission of those things, "for which the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience." (Note, Eph. 5:5—7.)

V. 11—17. In ascertaining our state and character, as well as in inquiring after our duty, it behooves us to advert especially to "the message," delivered to Christians "from the beginning, to love one another." For the children of God, are distinguished by humble, harmless, and self-denying love; as those of the devil are, by proud, selfish, and mischievous hatred: or disregard to the welfare of others, except as connected with their own comfort or enjoyment. The former love all men, and desire the happiness of the very persons, whose crimes they detest, and whose society they shun; though "the household of faith" attracts their special affection, and are the objects of their cordial estimation and complacency. But "the children of the wicked one," while "they live in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another," (Note, Tit. 3:3.) above all, despise, revile, envy, detest, and persecute those who bear the image, profess the truth, worship the name, love the cause, and seek the glory of Christ. For they are "like Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother; because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." Whilst we remember, that the same nature belongs to "all the children of disobedience," and the same spirit works within them, (Note, Eph. 2:1,2.) which prompted Cain to murder Abel, and the Jews to crucify the holy Jesus; we cannot "marvel if the world hate us;" nor ought we to be disconcerted by any insults or injuries with which we meet. If indeed we "love the brethren;" we may know, that we have passed from our natural state of enmity and spiritual death and condemnation; and are brought into the company of those, who are "alive to God through Jesus Christ our Lord." But if this radical grace be wholly wanting, the most plausible professor of the gospel "abideth in death:" yea, he is a murderer in his heart, he bears the image of Satan, and "hath not eternal life abiding in him." Nor is it enough for us to avoid direct malice and revenge: our love of the brethren, of our neighbours, and even of our enemies, must be positive and active, like that of our God and Saviour, who laid down his life for those whom he loved when enemies, in order that he might make them his friends and brethren. (Note, John 15:12—16.) If then, it may, in some cases, be our duty to lay down our lives for our brethren; surely we are bound continually to labour, expend, and deny ourselves, in various ways, to alleviate their sorrows, and promote their good; as circumstances may require, and opportunities are given us, even though our temporal provision be slender. What then shall we say to those persons, professing the gospel of Christ, who are rich in this world, and either hoard the greatest part of their wealth, or spend it in gratifying "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, or the pride of life," (Note, 2:15—17.) whilst they behold their poor brethren in distress, and refuse to pity them, or to part with any due proportion of their abundance, for their relief? How can it be thought that "the love of God dwelleth in them?" How can they help dreading "judgment without mercy, who have shown no mercy?" (Notes, Luke 6:37,38. Jam. 2:8—18.) Or how can "they suppose themselves followers of Christ," when "this world's good" is more valued by them, than his example, commandment, glory, and favour, or the comfort and even lives of their brethren? (Notes, Luke 16:19—31. 2 Cor. 8:6—9.)

V. 18—24. All Christians, whether rich or poor, should be careful to love one another, "not in word and in tongue, but in deed and in truth; leaving cheap and hollow compliments to the children of the wicked one;" as the necessary varnish and polishing of selfishness. Thus, in proportion as grace expands our hearts in love, and the fruits of it abound in our conduct, "we shall know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before God:" and there can be no reasonable doubt, that Christians would in general be far more satisfied of their acceptance, and enjoy more abundant consolation, if they were more diligent, self-denying, and liberal, in administering to the relief and comfort of their brethren. But when "our hearts condemn us," of acting contrary to our duty, and inconsistently with our profession; the consideration of the greatness, holiness, and omniscience of God must weaken our confidence, and give us apprehensions of being dealt with after our own measure of penuriousness and severity: while the Spirit of God, being grieved by our selfishness, will leave us disconsolate and full of darkness and terror. Thus we feel, when called by the hour or season to approach the throne of grace, as children, who being conscious of having acted contrary to the will of their parents, are ashamed and afraid to meet them; seek excuses for shunning them; or appear dejected in their presence, as afraid of rebukes, frowns, and corrections, and not expecting endearments and caresses. Hence much interruption and neglect of prayer; to our unspeakable detriment! But when our hearts do not condemn us of allowed deviations from our duty; then, like children who are conscious of having done aright, and, being assured of their loving parents' approbation, rejoice in their approach, we have confidence with God; and "whatsoever we ask we receive of him," because we show that we repent and believe, by "keeping his commandments, and doing those things which are well-pleasing in his sight." Thus a gratuitous salvation, and the holy obedience of love, are inseparably connected: as the substance of the command of God to sinners "is faith in his Son Jesus Christ, and love to one another" for his sake. This obedience, though utterly insufficient for our justification, (for "we are made the righteousness of God in Christ,") proves that "we dwell in him and he in us;" the sanctifying Spirit, which he has given us, forms and maintains the sacred union, and "seals us the children of God;" and his consolations are the foretastes of our eternal felicity.

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. Even while the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit were vouchsafed to the church, as well as his sanctifying and comforting influences, it was peculiarly incumbent on Christians to be upon their guard against "false prophets;" and important for them to be able accurately to distinguish between deceivers, and those who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren, "not to believe every spirit," or every man who professed to speak by a supernatural impulse, and to be under the guidance of the Spirit of God; but to make trial of all such pretensions, whether they who made them were of God, or not. (Note, 1 Thes. 5: 16—22.) This was absolutely necessary; because "many false prophets were gone forth into the world," who were instigated and prompted by Satan to propagate destructive heresies, in opposition to the doctrine and glory of Christ. (Notes, Matt. 24:23—25. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) In giving this direction, the apostle did not make his appeal to the miracles wrought by the true prophets. (Notes, Deut. 13:1—5. 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) But he deemed it more decisive, to determine the matter by the agreement or disagreement of their doctrine with that which the apostles had from the first "preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven." (Note, 1 Pet. 1: 10—12.) For this was confirmed by the Scriptures of the Old Testament; by all the miracles of Christ, and all the prophecies fulfilled in him; by his resurrection, and the accomplishment of his engagements and predictions; and by all the miracles performed by the first preachers and professors of Christianity, during a number of years: and nothing done by those false prophets, who opposed their doctrine, could pretend to equal this multiplied demonstration.—This shows, that Christians who are well acquainted with the Scriptures, may, in humble dependence on divine teaching, know for themselves, who it is that preaches according to the doctrine of the apostles, and who contradicts it; and that they are bound to make this trial of men and their tenets: and so it establishes the right of private judgment. It shows also, that no pretences to the Spirit, to inspiration, or new revelations, are to be regarded as any thing better than satanical delusions, when they are brought to disprove or oppose the fundamental doctrines delivered by the apostles; that even apparent miracles would be totally insufficient to authenticate an antiscriptural doctrine; and consequently that philosophical reasonings and human authority must be entirely disregarded. These premises conclude equally against Mystics, Enthusiasts, Papists, Socinians, and Deists: who may mutually despise and oppose each other, but all agree in setting up new lights, against the authenticated and complete light of divine revelation.—The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren, in examining and deciding, who spake by the Spirit of God, and who did not, to observe, that "every spirit which confessed Jesus Christ, as having come in the flesh, was of God." (Notes, 2:18—25. Matt. 10:32,33. 11:25—27. John 16:14,15. 1 Cor. 12:1—3.) This must be understood of an intelligent confession of the doctrine, delivered by the apostles, concerning the Lord Jesus, his Person, and his offices. The reality of his human nature was, no doubt, peculiarly adverted to by the expression, "come in the flesh:" but who could have doubted of his having been really a Man, if it had been generally understood and believed, that he was merely a Man? And if the apostle had not known, that, as "the Son of God," he could have come otherwise than "in the flesh;" he would scarcely have noticed his "coming in the flesh," as an essential part of this confession. For who would have said that John the Baptist, or John the apostle, came "in the flesh," when they were employed in preaching the gospel? for they must have come in human nature, seeing they had no other nature. (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:16. Heb. 2:14,15.) But the coming of Christ in human nature, when God "the Word became flesh, and tabernacled among men," was indeed essential to the apostle's doctrine concerning his redemption. (Note, John 1:14.) So that they, who did not confess him as "come in the flesh;" or who advanced any tenets contrary to his being "the Christ, the Son of the living God;" or to any of those offices, which as God manifested in the flesh he was anointed to perform; were not of God, whatever pretences they advanced to inspiration, or whatever appearances they exhibited of miraculous powers. For the spirit, which suggested such heresies, was that "of antichrist;" and they who spake by it, were men of the same infidel, ambitious, and impious disposition, as the principal antichrist would be, of whose coming they had heard; and who in fact was already in the world, in the various "false prophets," who in different ways opposed the true doctrine of Christ; and of whom the grand antichrist would prove the genuine successor.—These heretics, whom the apostle here showed to be the forerunners of the principal antichrist, have been proved by learned men to be the very same persons, whose sentiments the Socinians, and some others, now adopt and patronize as primitive Christianity: and it is not very improbable that the most fatal prevalence of antichrist, which is yet supposed to be future, will be in the garb of infidelity, or open opposition to the Deity and atonement of Christ; that is, "denying that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is come in the flesh," to be "the propitiation for the sins of the world;" and not in that of gross popery. V. 4—6. (Note, 2:20—25.) The Christians, whom John so affectionately addressed, "were of God," "born of God," his children, bearing his image, and adhering to his truth and will; and they had overcome the temptations of the false prophets and antichrists, who were "of the wicked one:" they had been enabled to withstand their assaults, and to reject with decision their pernicious doctrines. (Note, 2:12—14.) This had been done, through the teaching and assistance of "the Spirit of Christ," who dwelt in them; and who was more powerful to uphold and preserve them, than the evil spirit, who dwelt and wrought in the deceivers, and in the whole world of unbelievers, was to assault or injure them. The undeniable and stupendous miracles also, as well as the holy lives, of true Christians and faithful ministers, had in many places given them decided advantages over the false teachers, and driven them away with disgrace. These indeed were "of the world," though they professed to be Christians: they belonged to Satan's kingdom; they were of a worldly disposition; and aspired at secular distinctions and advantages. They therefore, "spake of the world," agreeably to its wisdom, maxims, and taste; so as not to offend, but to gratify, carnal men who loved the world; and to ensure their friendship, by flattering them, and giving them encouragement, while indulging their worldly lusts. (Notes, John 7:3—10. 14:15—17. 15:17—21.) On this account, "the world heard them" with approbation; they made rapid progress, had numerous followers, and drew off many unestablished professors of Christianity from their faithful teachers. But the apostle might say with confidence, of himself and of his brethren the other apostles, "We are of God:" and those who knew the holy and glorious character of God, and had an experimental acquaintance with him, through regeneration and by faith, adhered to their doctrine and instructions: whereas, those who were not "born of God," and did not truly belong to him, would not hear them, but attended to the more amusing or flattering or indulgent speculations of other teachers. But by this token, all impartial inquirers might know "the Spirit of truth, and that of error:" for they, who were influenced by "the Spirit of truth," adhered to the doctrine of the apostles, whilst their genuine piety and holiness showed that they belonged to God; but those who were guided by the spirit of error, opposed the doctrine of the apostles: and the worldly disposition and conduct of those who propagated and embraced their delusions, as well as the tendency and effects of them, showed evidently that neither they nor their religion were of God.—The same is the test and standard of truth to this day; nor can we, by any other rule, "try the spirits, whether they be of God, or not." (Notes, 1—3. Matt. 16:18,19.)—'Though the apostles be all dead; yet, as they speak in their divinely inspired writings, John in this passage declares, that their writings are the test, by which the disciples of Christ, since the decease of the apostles, are to judge both of teachers and of their doctrine.' Macknight. (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:1—4.)—Is in the world. (4) Notes, 5:19. John 12:27—33. 1 Cor. 2:10—13. 2 Cor. 4:3,4. Eph. 2:1,2. Rev. 12:7—12.

V. 7, 8. The apostle here resumed his exhortation to those who adhered to the true doctrine of Christ, that they would cultivate the most endeared affection towards one another: for this holy, spiritual, and self-denying "love is of God:" the effect and evidence of regeneration: insomuch, that every one, who thus loves Christians with special affection, and takes pleasure in doing them good, because of their likeness and relation to Christ, is certainly "born of God," and has a saving knowledge of him; (3:14.) whereas he, who does not thus love the image of God in his people, and, in general, is not of a loving and benevolent disposition, is not "born of God," and is destitute of any transforming knowledge of him. —25. 3 John 9—12.) For "GOD is LOVE," or essential goodness and benevolence. It is, as it were, his very nature to be kind, to communicate life, and impart felicity; and to provide for the happiness of his creatures, in all cases and methods, which consist with his infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and holiness; for love must always be exercised, in entire consistency with these attributes, by the perfect Source of all excellence. "The earth is filled with the goodness of the LORD," and doubtless the immensity of the creation is the same: holy angels derive from God complete and endless felicity, and rebellion alone has made any rational creatures suffer pain and misery. Being and happiness could not have been communicated, in that vast extent and degree, which they are and will be, without the creation of intelligent agents. These form a kingdom to be governed by a perfect law, and a righteous Sovereign. The very law of God is "love," as well as his nature: love of him and of each other, constitutes the sum of its holy, just, and kind requirements; and all would have been perfectly happy had all perfectly obeyed it. (Notes, Ex. 20:3. Lev. 19:18. Deut. 6:5. Rom. 7:9—12.) Unless infinite wisdom had seen it proper, that omnipotence should be unremittingly exerted, to prevent free agents from transgression, (which undeniable facts demonstrate that it did not;) this law must be guarded by sanctions: and those who break it must be exposed to a punishment proportioned to the offence. Thus love to creatures, at large, dictated both the law and its sanctions. When angels sinned, a God of love, in kindness to his obedient creatures, turned those from heaven to hell, who would have converted heaven into hell if they had continued there; except some other act of omnipotence had prevented it. When man's apostacy took place, the love of God was shown, not only in sparing sinners, and giving them a rich profusion of temporal benefits, while the sentence denounced against them was in part respited; but in so ordering it, that even their pains, sorrows, and temporal death were expressive of his wise compassion, and tended greatly to prevent the multiplication of crimes, and the increase of condemnation. Especially, the provision of the gospel, for the forgiveness of sin and the salvation of sinners, in consistency with the glory of the law and justice of God, whilst present sufferings are made subservient to the final and eternal felicity of believers, undeniably manifests that "God is Love." So immense were the obstacles to be surmounted, and so astonishing the method, by which mercy is honourably exercised to rebels, deserving of eternal misery; that, even if the entrance of sin had been prevented, or impunity and recovery to holiness could have been ensured to all transgressors without any such expedient, the love of God would not so clearly have appeared to be infinite and incomprehensible. Something we can now see of its immensity: and though impenetrable and incomprehensible mystery rest on many particulars respecting it: yet it will surely at length be seen, resplendent as the noonday sun, that the most perfect love presided, when, in the infinite wisdom of God, the entrance of sin was permitted; and when infinite justice, holiness, and truth determined to leave many rebels in their impenitency, to be "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction;" as connected with the election, redemption, and sanctification of the "vessels of mercy, who are thus prepared before unto glory." So that, if wise and holy love, in its most perfect exercise towards universal being, through eternity, had required or even admitted of it; no pain would have been suffered by any creature, much less would any have been left to be finally miserable.—But to argue from hence, that none will be finally miserable, in direct opposition to his testimony, who is TRUTH, and a CONSUMING FIRE, as well as LOVE, is the height of impiety and presumption. What do we know, concerning the purposes of love, to unnumbered millions, through eternal ages, which may be answered, in the infinitely wise counsels of God, by leaving comparatively a small number of rebels, to the merited punishment of their crimes? Men might on the same principles argue, that prisons and executions could not have any place in the dominions of an eminently benevolent prince: when, in reality, wise and equitable benevolence to numbers, would dictate severity to a few atrocious criminals, who would otherwise make multitudes wretched. (Notes, Prov. 20:8,26. 24: 24,25.) Indeed we might as reasonably argue, that since "God is Love," there can be no such thing as misery in the creation; for omnipotence could certainly have excluded it: but if infinite wisdom, justice, holiness, and truth require that Love himself should cause his creatures to endure anguish; (and here facts preclude the vain hypothesis, which speculation might otherwise have adopted;) no created understanding can determine, in what degree, to what duration, or in how many instances, the wise, righteous, and holy purposes of LOVE, may require the suffering of his rebellious subjects. So that all arguments and calculations of this kind prove nothing, but the vain self-wisdom of foolish man, who deems himself competent to determine, what God ought to do, and what he will do; and, in this presumption, opposes his arguments to the explicit testimony of God himself: and professes to honour his love, while he treats his truth as a lie, and supposes his awful threatenings to be terrifying delusions, to frighten the ignorant part of mankind into good behaviour, and to be despised by the more discerning! But it is enough for our purpose; that God has so shown himself to be LOVE in his dealings with us, that, after all our crimes, we cannot come short of eternal happiness, except through our unbelief and impenitent rebellion; while strict justice would have consigned us to hopeless and final misery, as soon as ever we transgressed our Creator's law.

V. 9—12. In this, "the love of God towards us," the apostate, rebellious, and depraved offspring of fallen Adam, has been especially "manifested; because he sent his only begotten into the world, that we might live through him." Hence it appears, that Christ is called "the only begotten Son of God," previous to his incarnation, or coming into the world: and that the love of God, in giving his own Son to assume our nature, in order to his expiatory sufferings, was more stupendous, than even in giving him, as incarnate, to the death upon the cross for us. (Notes, John 1:18. 3:16—21.)—When God in his infinite compassion and mercy designed so vast a blessing as "life eternal" for fallen men; his most perfect justice and holiness rendered it impossible for him to confer it, (for "he cannot deny himself,") except an all-sufficient atonement could be made for their sins: and when no other method, or none so proper for this end, was perceived by his infinite wisdom, as the sending of his own Son to be our Surety, and the atoning Sacrifice for our sins; "he spared him not;" but sent him "into the world, that we might live through him." (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26. 8:32—34. Heb. 7:26—28. 10:3,4.) None of our words or thoughts can do justice to such gratuitous, abundant, astonishing love, of a holy God towards sinners; to whom he owed nothing; who could not profit, or harm him; whom he might justly have crushed in a moment; who were most decisively shown to be deserving of his tremendous vengeance, in the very method by which they were saved: and when he could, by his omnipotent word, have created countless worlds, replenished with far more exalted beings, if he had seen good. (Notes, Rom. 5:6—10,15—21.) Search we then the whole universe for LOVE, in its most enlarged and glorious displays? We must at length be constrained to own, that it is to be found in the Person and the cross of Christ. "Herein is love," the splendour of which eclipses all, which has been seen elsewhere, from the beginning of the world; and which will be the special subject of admiring and adoring praise to all eternity.—Does love subsist between God and sinners? Here was the origin of it: "not that we loved God;" for we were enemies to his holy character, law, sovereignty, worship, and providence; but that "he," most freely, and with most condescending compassion, forgiveness, and liberality, "loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." (Notes, 2:1,2. John 15:12—16.) In this great event, all holy beings will for ever see, that "GOD is LOVE:" and the more fully redeemed sinners understand this subject, the clearer views will they have of that love, which can never be perfectly comprehended: whereas, those who exclude this view of the divine benignity, may speculate about the subject, but can scarcely know any thing concerning its real nature and glory.—If then "God hath so loved us," in providing salvation, and bringing us to partake of it; most certainly "we ought also to love one another," in imitation of his example, and in grateful obedience to his command; and to express this love, by a reciprocally forgiving, peacable, kind, liberal, and compassionate conduct. For "no man hath seen God," in respect of his divine essence, at any time; save, that "he who hath seen Christ, hath seen the Father" also: we therefore best prove, that we love him, by loving his image in his people, and by doing good to them for his sake. (Notes, Job 22:1—4. Ps. 16:2,3.) Thus it will appear, that "God dwells in us," by his new creating Spirit; and that his love has accomplished its object by producing its genuine effects upon our hearts, and in our renewal to his holy image.

V. 13—17. The apostles knew, and true Christians might know, that they "dwelt in God" by faith, and he in them as in his consecrated temple, "because he had given them of his Spirit." (Notes, 3:18—24. Rom. 8:5—17.) For, besides the miraculous powers conferred on some, the Holy Spirit had so changed the hearts of all true believers, and so made them "partakers of a divine nature," that they loved the children of God with a holy love, and copied his example in their conduct to each other. Under this influence and energy, the apostles and others, who had seen Christ, and had long known and experienced his love, in all its inestimable fruits and consolations, did testify to their fellow-sinners every where, that "the Father had sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world," and to confer pardon, grace, and eternal life, on all men, in every place, who sought them from the Father, through the propitiation of the Son, by living faith in his name. Whoever, therefore, should hear and receive this testimony, and "confess Jesus to be the Son of God," acknowledging the love of the Father in this gracious dispensation, cordially falling in with the design of it, and venturing the enmity of ungodly men, in professing the faith of the gospel, and obeying the divine Saviour, might be assured, that "he dwelt in God," as his Refuge and Rest, and that God dwelt in him, as his beloved temple. (Notes, 3:18—24. Is. 57:15,16. 2 Cor. 6: 14—18. Eph. 2:19—22.)—All such general expressions must be interpreted according to the context: for unless the confession of Christ were sincere, intelligent, and influential, the man could not be a partake of holy love; and therefore the apostle would have contradicted what he before asserted, if he had meant a mere confession with the lips, without faith and grace in the heart. (8) But true Christians had known, understood, and experienced, as well as believed, the love, which God had shown towards them, in the redemption of his Son; and it had had a transforming effect upon them, by bringing them to resemble God, in the nature and fruits of their love; and by an habitual exercise of this holy affection towards God, each other, and all men; and to live in the most endeared and intimate union with him. Thus their love to the Lord was "made perfect," or produced its genuine and valuable effects, in their love to one another: and they cultivated this holy disposition, and acted from it, in order that they might have boldness in the day of judgment. (Notes, 2:26—29. Matt. 25:31—46.) Because as Christ was, so were they in this world: like him, they were influenced by holy love to do good to others in a self-denying manner; and, being treated with contempt, reproach, and enmity, they meekly and patiently endured it, and persevered in "doing good against evil" as he had done. Or, "as God is, so are they;" they bear his image, which the world hates: for this may be the meaning, and it is coincident with the preceding interpretation.

Saviour of the world. (14) Σωτηρα του κοσμου. John 4:42.

V. 18. In loving God, through Jesus Christ, as this love is made perfect in loving Christians and all men for the Lord's sake, there is no terror: the obedience and good works performed from this principle, are not like the servile diligence of one, who reluctantly labours from dread of a hated master's indignation; but like that of a dutiful child, who performs services to a beloved father, which conduce to the benefit of his brethren and family; and are, on every account, pleasing, and voluntarily performed. (Notes, Ex. 20:18—25. 1 Sam. 12:20. Rom. 8:14—17. 2 Tim. 1:6—8.)—Reverence of the majesty of God, and fear of dishonouring him, are intimately connected with the most perfect exercises of holy love: but terrifying apprehensions of vengeance have no place in it; and cease, in proportion as love prevails, and inspires confidence and gratitude. So that "perfected love" of God (and of man for his sake) must produce such full satisfaction of acceptance, such delight in his service, and such experience of his consolations, as to cast out all terror. This gives torment, or punishment, to the mind, from which "the Spirit of adoption" proportionably delivers the believer. The remains and returns of these terrors, therefore, in the experience of established believers, show, that they are not "perfected in love;" yet they have great use, in this state of conflict and imperfections, in all respects. The habitual prevalence of them however implies, that the persons concerned are not duly brought under the influence of "the Spirit of adoption," but serve God more from slavish fear, than from filial love. In heaven love will be perfect, and fear will be for ever completely excluded; and in this world the more we obey God from love, and the less we need and experience that "fear, which hath punishment," at least castigation, the more of heaven we enjoy. Yet this does not imply, that any Christians are made absolutely perfect in love on earth, to the full demand of the divine law; or that slavish fears prove a man to have no love, or grace; or that exemption from fear of every kind, is the privilege of believers. It is equally true, "that blessed is he that feareth alway," as that "perfect love casteth out fear:" for different kinds of fear are meant. (Notes, Prov. 28:14. Rom. 11:16—21. Heb. 4:1,2. 1 Pet. 1:17—21.)

Fear.] Φοβος. Rom. 13:5. 2 Cor. 5:11. 1 Pet. 3:14.—'The terror of the wicked, dreading God as a Judge, and fearing to offend only in regard of punishment.' Leigh. It is, however, very often used in a good sense, for reverential fear.—Torment.] Κολασιν. Matt. 25:46. Κολαζομαι, Acts 4:21. 2 Pet. 2:9. 'It is taken for the terrors of conscience arising from servile fear, which are ... foretastes of eternal punishment.' Leigh.

V. 19. They who serve God from filial affection, not from slavish fear, "love him, because he first loved them." Not that their love is merely gratitude for previous benefits, which, abstracted from other exercises of love, would be only a selfish affection; and not at all that holy love, which the law as written in the hearts of all true Christians requires: for that love is commanded previous to the consideration of redemption, and our failure in it causes us to need that love of God towards us, of which the apostle was speaking. It mere gratitude for mercy and personal forgiveness were exclusively intended; no man could love God at all, on good grounds, without some immediate revelation, to assure him that he was the object of his special love, even while he continued altogether impenitent and sinful. (Note, Luke 7:44—50. P. O. 36—50.) But the evident meaning is, that if the Lord had not "loved them," before they loved him, "even when they were dead in sin," they must for ever have continued enemies to him. (Note, 9—12.) His love suggested the plan, and provided the means of redemption; he revealed to sinners his glorious perfections and abundant mercy, in the Person and work of his Son; he sent his word, to declare to sinners this great salvation, and to invite them to partake of it; he regenerated them by his Spirit, and so brought them, by repentance, and faith in Christ, into a state of acceptance and reconciliation; and thus he taught and enabled them to love his excellency, to value his favour, to be thankful for his inestimable benefits, and zealous for his glory. (Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Eph. 2:4—10. Tit. 3:4—7.) As, therefore, his love to them was the original source of their love to him; so, from the latter they might infer the former: if they were sure that they loved God, they might be sure that "he had first loved them," and they ought to take the comfort of the happy change, which had been wrought in them, whilst they gave him the whole glory of it.

V. 20, 21. The love of God in Christ, produced in the heart of Christians, by "the Spirit of adoption," should be considered as the grand proof of their conversion: (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:28—31.) yet that love also must be tried by its effects, in their temper and conduct towards their brethren. (Note, 5:1—3.) For if a man profess to "love God, and yet hate his brother," and either indulge habitual resentment against any one, or show a spiteful or selfish disposition, or contempt and enmity of the image of God in his children; he is no doubt "a liar," a false professor. (Notes, 2:7—11. 3:11—17.) For if a man do not love the holy image of God in his brother, "whom he hath seen," and whose good behaviour is sensibly endearing and advantageous to him; or refuses to show kindness to his brother in distress, when he knows this to be the commanded expression of love to God; how can he be supposed to love God, "whom he hath not seen," whose perfection he can only contemplate at a distance, who is not visibly present to excite him to suitable returns of affection, and who cannot want, or be profited by any of his services? So that the pretence of loving God, when the love of the brethren is neglected, is no more than a cloak of selfishness, or an excuse for malignant passions. And indeed this is the express command of God, that our

CHAPTER V.

The apostle shows the connexion between faith in Christ, regeneration, love to God and his children, obedience to his commandments, and victory over the world, 1—5. He states the manifold testimonies, by which the doctrine of Christ is proved; and declares the inseparable union between faith and eternal life; 6—13. He reminds Christians of the Lord's readiness to hear their prayers, for themselves and each other, 14, 15; gives an intimation of "a sin unto death," and the regenerate man's security against committing it, 16—18; he strongly marks the difference between the "world that lieth in wickedness," and true believers, 19, 20; and cautions Christians against idolatry, 21.

WHOSOEVER [a]believeth that Jesus is the Christ, [b]is born of God: [c]and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him.

love to him should be shown by the love of our brethren: but how can he be supposed to love God, who habitually violates his command, and acts contrary to his most endearing example? (Note, 5:1—3. Marg. Ref. h.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. We live in an age, in which but few advance claims to immediate revelations: yet we have at least as much cause to try men's doctrines and religion by the word of God, as they had in the primitive times. For "many false teachers are gone forth into the world;" who agree in scarcely any thing, but in denying "that the Son of God is come in the flesh," to be "the Propitiation for our sins," and the anointed High-Priest, Prophet, and King of his church; and the Saviour of a ruined world. If indeed no teachers, who do not confess the doctrine of the apostles, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ, "God manifested in the flesh," "are of God," which the apostle expressly asserts; and if all others are actuated by the lying spirit of antichrist; we may truly say, that antichrist did not much more prevail, in the darkest days of popery, than in these times of infidelity, skepticism, socinianism, arianism, mysticism, and antinomianism; whilst the scriptural doctrine concerning the Person, or some of the offices of Christ, seems to be wholly excluded from the religion of a large proportion among his professed disciples! nay, from that of some, who possess high authority and much influence in the church. But there is a remnant, "who are of God," and who have overcome the assaults of all these deceivers, and will be finally victorious over them; because they are taught and kept by "the Spirit of Christ, who is greater" than the evil spirit, which still "worketh in the children of disobedience." Indeed, they whose wisdom, principles, spirit, and conduct accord to the judgment and disposition of the world, will be heard, applauded, and followed by worldly men, as far as their consciences find it convenient to have some kind of religion, by way of an opiate: and as the way to destruction is broad and frequented, no wonder that they have the majority on their side; for in all ages and places hitherto, the friends of God have been comparatively few. (Notes, Matt. 7:13—20.) We must not indeed take it for granted, as the apostle did, that "we are of God:" or that "he who knoweth God heareth us:" but, as far as we can prove, that our doctrine, temper, and conduct, "accord to the oracles of God," we may be confident, that he will maintain our cause, and that his friends and children will favour us: and the characters of the persons who adhere to the testimony of preachers, and that of those who reject it, may often go far in deciding, who they are that declare the humbling, holy truths of God, and who speak the dictates of "the spirit of error." For numbers are incapable of doing so much honour to the ministry of the true servants of God in any other way, as they do by forsaking, deriding, and reviling it; whilst their actions show to all, who understand that most emphatical language, the strong reasons of their dislike. (Note, John 3: 19—21. 7:3—10.

V. 7—17. Again and again, we are exhorted to "love one another, because love is of God:" in proportion as this love abounds in our heart, and regulates our behaviour, we bear the image of God, and show that we are "born of him, and know him." Thus we anticipate the temper and happiness, and, as it were, breathe the air of heaven: whilst enmity, selfishness, malice and revenge, are from hell, and the beginning of the misery "prepared for the devil and his angels" and children. But our "GOD is LOVE:" and with such displays of this endearing attribute before us, and such obligations as we are brought under to it; how large, liberal, and fervent ought our love of each other to be, and even that of our very enemies! Seeing that "God hath manifested his love towards us, in sending his own Son, to be the propitiation for the sins" of us rebels and enemies, "that we might live through him:" how earnest ought we to be, in using all means, with persevering self-denial, to promote the welfare, and save the souls, of those who are most injurious to us! And how should we lay ourselves out, to do good to our fellow-Christians for the Lord's sake! Let us not then think it enough to admire the love of God in Christ Jesus: but, since we cannot profit him, "whom no man hath seen or can see;" let us show our love and gratitude to him, by imitating his kind and merciful conduct, in our dealings with our brethren and neighbours. Thus it will appear that he dwells and rules in our hearts; and "his love will be perfected in us."—Whilst we profess to believe the doctrine which the apostles testified to mankind, and confess "that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world;" may our holy loving tempers show, that "he hath given us of his Spirit!" Then it will appear that we have understood the nature and glory, as well as believed the revelation, of "the love which God hath to us:" and that, as "God is love," so "we dwell in love," and "in God, and he in us." In this way our love will grow unto perfection; and our confidence, before the mercy-seat, will be an anticipation of our "boldness in the day of judgment;" while we are conscious, that as he, our Lord and Saviour was, "so are we in this evil world."

V. 18—21. By "the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," we shall, the most effectually, be relieved from slavish and tormenting fears: for the more we feel of the loving temper of children towards our Father, and of affection to our brethren for his sake; the less we shall fear being treated as enemies, and the fuller will be our assurance of the special love of God to us. Nor would there be occasion for our being left to the painful restraint and impulse of terror, if we were more entirely "constrained by love," in every part of our duty: so that all our disquieting doubts and apprehensions arise from our not being made perfect in love. (Note, Jer. 32:39—41.) Let us then pray without ceasing, that we may more entirely "love him, who hath first loved us:" and if it be evident, that our natural enmity is changed into filial affection and gratitude; let us bless the name of our God for this seal and earnest of eternal felicity; and, in return for his mercy, and in obedience to his commandment, let us do good to our brethren also, and to all men, for his sake, and after his example; and thus show, that though our love is imperfect, yet that we essentially differ from all those who profess "to love God whom they have not seen," and yet "hate their brethren whom they have seen."

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—3. Every man, who truly believes Jesus to be the promised Messiah, and receives, honours, and obeys him in that character, according to the predictions of the Old Testament, and the testimony of the apostles concerning him, is doubtless "born of God:" (Notes, John 1:10—13.) as this faith must be the effect of divine life, and cannot be separated from repentance, love, and other graces, or those good fruits which spring from them; and all, who credibly profess this faith, are entitled to that love which Christians owe to their brethren, whatever differences there might be in their previous character, abilities, rank, or situation. For every one who loves God, the Father of all the regenerate, must also love every one of his children: (Notes, 4:7,8,19—21.) even as men commonly love and show kindness to the offspring of their dear friends, and liberal benefactors. (2 Sam. 9: 19:31—40. Notes, John 8:41—47. Philem. 8—11.) But, as every gracious affection might be counterfeited, it was necessary to observe, that this genuine "love of the children of God" might be distinguished from all natural benevolence, or party attachments, by its inseparable connexion with the love of God, and a cheerful upright obedience to all his commandments: for the same Spirit, who had brought the sinner's heart to love the image of God in his children, must also have taught them to love his holy character, precepts, and service. (Note, Jam. 2:8—13.) Christians might therefore know their love of the brethren to be spiritual, and evidential of their having "passed from death unto life;" by a disposition to love and obey God in all other respects: whereas that man could not truly love the children of God, who habitually committed known sin, or neglected known duty. (Notes, John 14:15—17,21—24. 15:9—11.) So that these distinct parts of the Christian's character must reciprocally prove each other to be genuine. In fact, the nature, tendency, effect, and, as it were, the essence of love to God, consist in its disposing the heart to unreserved and cheerful obedience: and, as his commandments are "holy, just, and good," the rule of liberty and felicity; so they, who are "born of God" and love him, do not count or find them "grievous," but delight in obedience; and only groan and lament that they cannot serve him more perfectly. (Notes, Ps. 119:4,5. Matt. 11:28—30. Rom. 7:22—25.) Indeed, the natural love of worldly objects, which is found in every human heart; and the fear of those inconveniences and sufferings, which the displeasure of ungodly men threatens and occasions (in some measure at all times) to the faithful servants of God, render obedience, in the present state of things, arduous, and connected with self-denial, and various losses, perils, hardships, and distresses, from which, in other circumstances, it would be wholly exempted. But true Christians are possessed of a principle of the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

5 Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?

6 This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is Truth.

V. 4, 5. "That which is born of God," that new and heavenly nature which is communicated in regeneration, tends so powerfully to God and holiness, and includes in its essence such a spiritual judgment, and such heavenly affections; that all, in whom it is found, are by it made victorious over the world; and overcome both their natural love for its honours, riches, pleasures, decorations, and friendship; and their natural fear of the frown, rage, and contempt of worldly men. (Notes, 2:15—17. 4:4—6. John 16:31—33. Rom. 12:2.) Thus they are prepared for submitting to losses, exercising self-denial, and enduring affliction in the cause of God; and are taught to disregard the maxims, fashions, customs, and opinions of ungodly men, however eminent, numerous, or powerful. This "new creature," as "born of God," has the ascendency in the heart of the youngest and feeblest true Christian; and therefore they all aspire after and attain unto this victory. For, though the conflict of grace with corrupt nature, and the allurements and terrors of the world, is often very sharp; and the regenerate man may be baffled, cast down, nay, apparently slain in the battle: yet "his seed remaineth in him," and the divine life, being again invigorated by the Holy Spirit, will excite him to arise and renew the combat, with redoubled fortitude and resolution. So that at length the victory will be his decidedly; and he will habitually profess the truth, and do the will of God, as far as he knows them, whatever loss, suffering, disgrace, or hardship may ensue; even if he should be exposed to death, in its most terrifying form, by his adherence to his duty. In acquiring this honourable "victory," faith is principally concerned: a realizing belief of the testimony of God, concerning invisible and eternal things, operating by fear of his wrath, and hope of holy felicity in his favour; a believing reliance on Christ for redemption, and all the blessings that flow from it, working by love and gratitude; with an abiding sense of God's presence at all times, to witness every action, and to support, help, and comfort those who trust in him. These exercises of faith give such a determination to the true Christian's conduct, that he cannot habitually do what he knows to be contrary to the will of God, whatever emolument, credit, or favour he may acquire by so doing: nor can he habitually neglect what God commands, to whatever loss, reproach, or suffering it may expose him. (Notes, Rom. 6:1,2. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Gal. 2:17—21. Heb. 11:27. 12:2,3. Rev. 12:7—12.) Through temporary weakness of faith, he may be drawn into sins and negligences: but he will soon find such fear, shame, sorrow, remorse, and self-abhorrence, in his heart and conscience; that he cannot but return into the way of obedience, and reject the wages of transgression, whatever may be the consequence. Nor can this ever be altered; unless it be possible, that "the shield of faith" should be finally torn from him. (Note, Luke 22:31—34.) This is universally the case with true believers; though the temporary suspension of faith, and a consequent prevalence of worldly affections, may be longer in some cases than in others; during which lamentable seasons, their evidence of sincerity must be equally weakened. And this is peculiar to believers; so that we may challenge the whole earth, to produce one instance of a man, who "did not believe in the Son of God," that had, in every respect, so "overcome" the love and fear of all persons and things in the world, as not habitually, in one way or other, to act contrary to his own judgment and conscience, from a regard to interest, reputation, ease, liberty, indulgence, friendship, or social and relative comfort and affection: or in order to avoid derision, reproach, the censure of singularity, or more material losses and sufferings. All men, except believers in Christ, are habitually enslaved, in some respect or other, to the customs, opinions, or interests of the world: and who is there, that dares, in all things, to act according to the conviction of his own mind, without being warped by the general influence of society, or that of his own particular circle, or sometimes even of his own domestics? He, and he only, can do this, who "believes that Jesus is the Son of God," and trusts in him for salvation, according to the Scriptures: his faith, united with humble love, spirituality, fear of coming short of salvation, hatred of sin, a constant respect to his Lord's example, an indifference for worldly objects, and a deep persuasion of the miserable condition of all worldly men, gives him this victory. (Note, Gal. 6:11—14.) He habitually in all things follows the dictates of his own conscience, and the commandments of his Lord, whatever consequences may follow, and when he is betrayed into an incidental deviation from this rule, he deeply repents of it, and attempts renewed obedience.—Hence it is, that the world will tolerate all other persons, except true believers, whatever their forms or notions be; because all others will, in some respects, comply with the humours and court the friendship of worldly men. But Christians are so unpliant, and so determined to follow their Lord, according to their own judgment of truth and duty, without regarding the opinions, counsels, attentions, derision, revilings, or enmity of the many, the wise, the great, the learned, or the virtuous; nay, without being turned aside by persuasion or the dictates of affection and gratitude, from the line of duty; they cleave to their religious singularities, (as they are deemed,) at so great an expense, and often amidst so many sufferings; and in so many ways, they "testify of the world, that its works are evil," and its wisdom folly; that they can hope for no quarter from worldly men, but must expect to be hated or despised by all for Christ's sake: even as he was, who perfectly "overcame the world," as their Surety and example.—It may be proper here to observe, that the Christian, in proportion to his knowledge and grace, will be singular, only where truth and duty require him; and steadfast, according to the certainty or importance of the truth and duty: but in all things which he deems indifferent, and where his own will or interest alone are concerned, he will endeavour to be pliant; in order to show that his pertinacious adherence to his rule of duty, is the effect of conscientiousness, and not of obstinacy and affectation.

Whatsoever is born. (4) Παν το γεγεννημενον. Some read, πας ὁ γεγεννημενος, every one who is born. The meaning is nearly the same; but it is not expressed so exactly and clearly as in our reading, which is of far superior authority.—How can all these propositions concerning "him who is born of God;" and "all that which is born of God," be explained by those, who suppose that baptism, or something inseparably connected with it, when rightly administered, is exclusively meant?

V. 6. Having mentioned Jesus "the Son of God," the apostle observed, that this was the anointed Saviour "who came by water and blood." As he entered on his ministry on earth, when he was baptized with water by John, and closed it by shedding his blood on the cross; so, after his death, "water and blood" flowed from his pierced side, as emblematical of the removal of our guilt by his atoning sacrifice; and the purifying of our souls by his grace, after his example, and according to his commandments. (Notes, John 19:31—37. 1 Cor. 6:9—11.) For "he came" to save sinners, "not by the water only"—not merely by teaching them the way of holiness, and enabling them to walk in it; "but by the water and the blood;" by atoning for their guilt, and thus making way for their sanctification, and the acceptance of their persons, and works of faith and love. To this the Holy Spirit bore witness, both in the miracles wrought by those who taught this doctrine, and the holy lives, the patient sufferings, and the abundant consolations of such as embraced it. (Notes, 7,8. John 15:26,27. Acts 5:32. Heb. 2:1—4.) This testimony of the Spirit to the doctrine of his atonement, as the Son of God, come in the flesh, to save sinners by his blood-shedding, could not be objected to, or rejected; "because the Spirit is the Truth," even essential Truth itself, which cannot possibly deceive or be deceived.' The two sacraments of baptism with water, the outward sign of regeneration, and purifying from the pollution of sin, by the Holy Spirit; and that of the Lord's supper, as the outward sign of the creatures of his body and the shedding of his blood, and the receiving him by faith, for pardon and justification, seem also intended. (Notes, 6,7,20,21. 4:1—8. John 14:4—6,15—17. 16:12,13.)

V. 7, 8. These doctrines, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ, had been and were attested, in the most unexceptionable manner. For there were "Three," who from heaven, the holy habitation, in which the divine presence and glory is peculiarly displayed, had borne witness to it: "The Father," who repeatedly, in an audible voice from heaven, had declared Jesus to be his "beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased;" (Notes, Matt. 3:16,17. 17:5—8. John 12:27—33.) and had borne witness to the same truth, as well as to the acceptance of his sacrifice, by raising him from the dead: "the Word" who was himself God, as well as "from the beginning with God;" who had testified, that "He and the Father were One;" that "he who had seen him had seen the Father," and that "he would shed his blood a ransom for many;" while his miracles, and the fulfilment of ancient prophecies in him, the accomplishment of his own predictions in his resurrection, and various other events, showed his testimony to be divine, and that he came from heaven in human nature, to attest these truths to man; "and the Holy Ghost;" who descended from heaven, as a dove, and rested on Christ at his baptism; (Notes, Luke 3:21,22. John 1:30—34.) who had "borne witness to him," by the mouth of all his prophets from the beginning of the world; and who came forth from the Father and the Son, to attest his resurrection and exaltation to the mediatorial throne, by the gift of tongues, and other miraculous powers, communicated to the apostles on the day of Pentecost. These three divine witnesses, though personally distinct, were yet "One," in the Unity of the Godhead, in a most mysterious and incomprehensible manner.—There were also "three that bear witness on earth," perpetuating, as it were, the testimony of "the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit," whose special abode is in heaven, and whose testimony was immediately from thence: even "the Spirit," in the miraculous powers communicated to the disciples, by the laying on of the apostles' hands; the sanctifying efficacy of their doctrine; the holy conduct and consolations of Christians; and the prophecies delivered to the new testament church, which would be fulfilled from age to age: "the water," or the initiatory ordinance of baptism, by water, "into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit:" (Notes, Matt. 3:5,6. 28:19,20.) "and the blood," or the Lord's supper, which was appointed as a memorial and attestation of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, till his second coming; and which permanently testifies, that pardon and salvation may be obtained by faith in the atoning blood of him, whose name is Emmanuel, who is "God manifest in the flesh," and who will surely come to be our Judge; but in no other way. (Notes, 6. Matt. 26:26—28. 1 Cor. 10:14—17. 11:23—28.) As the accomplishment of the prophecies contained in the New Testament fully counterbalances the ceasing of miraculous gifts; so these divine attestations to the scriptural doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, and the two grand constituent parts of his salvation, continue to this present day, and shall to the end of the world: and we at present have abundant testimony to those truths, which our Father in heaven, the incarnate Word, and the Holy Spirit, immediately testified to the primitive Christians.—It is well known, that volumes have been written concerning part of the seventh verse and the beginning of the eighth; in order to prove, or to disprove, the authenticity of the passage enclosed within crotchets. It is certainly wanting in many of the ancient manuscripts and versions; and is not authenticated by many of the Fathers: but whether the Trinitarians interpolated it, or the Arians and Unitarians omitted it, is to this day a matter of controversy, and not likely to be fully determined. Upon such questions men will in general decide, according to their preconceived opinions: yet it is very wrong to deviate from truth in support of system. It is, however, perhaps somewhat more likely that the Arians or Anti-Trinitarians should silently omit in their copies a testimony which was so decisive against them, or that it should be left out by the mistake of some ancient transcriber, than that the Trinitarians should directly forge and insert it. The Trinitarian, in fact, would be deprived only of one argument out of very many, with which he might attempt the conviction of his opponent, if this text were wholly rejected as spurious; for his doctrine is abundantly supported by other Scriptures: but if this testimony were admitted as the unerring word of GOD; all the ingenuity and diligence of opponents, would scarcely suffice to explain it away, or to avoid the inference, which must naturally be drawn from it. It has indeed by some, even Trinitarians, been maintained, that the words rendered, "these three are One," only mean, that their testimony is one: but the writer of the passage, whoever he was, did not speak of testimony, but of persons: else, why is the word translated three, of the masculine gender? Or why is the expression so remarkably varied in the next verse? "These three," the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, "are One." It may also be doubtful, whether the passage connects with so much propriety, if the contested words be omitted, as it otherwise does: for if we read, with the copies in which they are wanting, "The Spirit beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth: for there are three that bear record, ... the Spirit, and the water, and the blood, &c." there seems to be a remarkable repetition, and a want of the apostle's usual energy in the passage: and it does not appear evident for what reason "the water and the blood," or the two great ordinances of the New Testament, as outward signs of sanctification and justification, by the grace and atoning blood of the Son of God, and as agreeing in One with the testimony of the Spirit, should be mentioned: and yet nothing should be hinted concerning the testimony of the Father from heaven to Christ, as his beloved Son; or that of Christ himself, as confirmed by his miracles and resurrection, and the fulfilment of his promise in pouring the Holy Spirit on his assembled disciples. As the words stand in our copies, there is indeed a most abundant concurrence of divine testimonies to the Person and doctrine of Christ, pointed out in a most compendious and energetic manner.—It cannot, however, be expected that in such a publication as this, a question, which has long employed the attention of the most learned men in Christendom, should be settled: and after assigning the above reasons in favour of the authenticity of the passage; I confess that I myself am very doubtful, whether they be sufficient to counterbalance the arguments of those who think otherwise. We need not, however, be anxious on the subject, as we have scriptural evidence in abundance, without this text, to confirm our faith in one God, subsisting in three coequal Persons, "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost," into whose One name we have been baptized.

V. 9, 10. The testimony of two or three credible men, was, by the law, deemed sufficient to prove any matter of fact; and almost all human affairs, even when the lives of men, or the interests of whole nations, lie at stake, are conducted and determined by "receiving the testimony of men." And though it is known, that all men are liable to be deceived or mistaken, and prone to deceive: yet he that should refuse to act upon human testimony, and should require another kind of demonstration, in all the various concerns of life, must soon, not only give over all business, but refuse his most needful sustenance. If then, "the testimony of man" must be received, how absurd is it to reject that of God! This must be "greater," or more indisputably certain; (3:20.) as "he knoweth all things," cannot mistake or be imposed on, can have no possible inducement to deceive his creatures, is essential Truth, and "cannot lie." (Notes, 6. Ps. 19:7—11 Is. 8:20.) "The testimony of God" is therefore the highest kind of demonstration: and we only need inquire into the evidence, or proof, that he has spoken; and into the meaning of his words, in which the honest, humble, and diligent inquirer will not be left greatly to mistake; and then we obtain the utmost certainty which can be conceived, in things of the highest possible importance. (Notes, Heb. 11:1,2. 1 Pet. 3 13—16.) Thus faith appropriates the information, contained in "the testimony of God," and in a most compendious manner renders a man "wise unto salvation."—For the principal truth, which "God hath testified" in his holy word, is that which relates to his Son, and to the way of salvation through him. (Notes, 11,12. John 5:31—47. 20:24—31.) He, therefore who credits "the witness" or testimony "of God," will "believe on the Son of God," and rely on him for the blessings, which he came into the world to procure for sinners by his righteousness and redemption, and to bestow on them. In consequence of this faith, the Christian receives another, and still more satisfactory testimony to the truth of the gospel, which also seals to him his interest in Christ and his salvation. For "he that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness" or testimony "in himself." The discoveries made to him of the glory of God in the Person of Christ, and the change thus produced in his judgment, dispositions, and affections; (Notes, 20,21. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. 4:5,6.) the views which he has received of the evil of sin, of his own character and condition, of the deceitfulness and wickedness of his heart, and of the wretched state of the world around him, all of which he now perceives to accord exactly with the declarations of Scripture though once he saw nothing of it; the victory which he is enabled by faith to obtain over the world, his own evil habits and propensities, and the temptations of Satan; the evident answers which many of his prayers receive, and his experience of the faithfulness of God to his promises, and of his providential regard to him; and, above all, "the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Spirit of adoption;" the peace, hope, and consolation connected with it; the pleasure he finds in communion with God, and obedience to his will; his delight in the society of spiritual persons, and the support which he receives when afflicted: these, and similar experiences, form a "testimony in himself," to which all other men must be strangers. For thus "the Spirit of God witnesses with his spirit, that he is the child of God," and gives him sweet earnests, and foretastes of his eternal inheritance. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 8:14—17.) This puts the matter out of all doubt with him; (except in hours of peculiar darkness, conflict, temptation, or humiliating correction;) and he can no more be argued out of his belief of the leading truths of the gospel, respecting the Person and salvation of Christ, by any ingenuity or sophistry of infidels or heretics, than he could be convinced by logic, that the sun is a dark, cold body, when he sees its light, and feels its genial warmth. This testimony proves that the Scripture is the word of God, that he rightly understands the most essential parts of it, and that he is a partaker of the blessing thus announced to him. (Notes, John 14:15—24. 2 Cor. 1:21,22. 2 Pet. 1:19—21. Rev. 2:17.) On the other hand, he who believeth not God, in respect of his testimony to his Son, can never receive "the witness in himself;" but must expect his heavy displeasure; seeing "he maketh God a liar," or treats his word as a lie, as utterly unworthy of credit or confidence. This is the case of every one, "who believes not the testimony which God hath given of his Son," and confirmed in all the ways above enumerated. As all revelation centres in this fundamental doctrine; it is in vain for a man to plead, that the believes "the testimony of God" in other things, while he rejects it in this. His opinion may indeed accord with the doctrine of Scripture, in matters less affronting to human pride, more level with the human understanding, or more reconcileable to the love, friendship, and pursuits of the world. Thus a man assents to scriptural truths, because he thinks they may be otherwise proved; at least there is no other evidence to be opposed to "the testimony of God," and nothing to be lost by assenting to it. But if his own reasonings, or those of some philosophy, lead to a conclusion contrary to the word of God: he will "lean to his own understanding," or believe in a philosopher, and treat "the testimony of God as a lie." Nay, men professing to believe the Scriptures will reject doctrines expressly revealed there, or employ a perverse diligence and ingenuity to explain them away, merely because they can find no philosophical arguments, with which to confirm the testimony of God! The light of the sun is not sufficient for them, nor will they be satisfied with it, unless they can see the same objects by their own dim candle! On the other hand, they will profess to believe the word of God, when it accords with their own reasonings, or the opinion of some philosopher; who perhaps borrowed that glimmering from Scripture, which preserves his scheme from total darkness: and they sometimes suppose themselves doing good service, when they call such witnesses to support "the testimony of God!" So that, in fact, they do not believe God, but other witnesses, when they assent to scriptural truth: for they directly treat him as a false witness, when he contradicts their preconceived opinions. It is therefore evident, that no belief of the Bible, or of any thing revealed in it, is of any avail to salvation, except a man believe "the testimony which God hath given of his Son." V. 11, 12. "The record," or testimony, "of God," concerning which the apostle had repeatedly spoken, might be summed up in few words, as to its grand outline: "God hath given," of his free mercy and bounty, "to us," men, sinners, rebels, and enemies, even to all of our fallen race, who are willing to accept of the inestimable gift in his appointed way, "eternal life," everlasting felicity, with every thing pertaining to it: "and this life is in his Son;" in his Person, as "God manifested in the flesh;" (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) and in his mediatory offices, as having all fulness in him, in consequence of his atoning sacrifice, for the pardon, sanctification, and salvation of every believer. (Notes, John 1:16. Col. 2:1—10.) So that this eternal life must be obtained and enjoyed, by union and communion with Christ, both in respect of the title to it, the meetness for it, and the earnests, and the full and final possession of it. (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Col. 3:1—4.) He, therefore, "that hath the Son, hath life;" he that by true faith receives Christ, as the Son of God, and as his Prophet, High-Priest, and King; his "Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption;" who humbly depends on him for all these purposes, and is thus interested in him, and vitally united to him, and continually seeks and derives the blessings of salvation from him, through the influences of the Holy Spirit; "hath life," is spiritually alive, has the promise of eternal life ratified to him, and the sure earnests of it in his soul, which shall certainly be completed in his everlasting felicity. (Notes, John 1:10—13. 5:24—27. 11:20—27. 14: 4—6.) "And he, that hath not the Son of God, hath not life:" he, who denies him to be truly and properly "the Son of God," and refuses to trust and honour him as such, or who disdains to submit to his teaching as his Prophet, to rely on his atonement and intercession as his High-Priest, or to obey him as his King, "hath not life;" he is "dead in sin," under condemnation, and "the wrath of God abideth on him:" nor will any morality, learning, philosophy, forms of religion, doctrinal notions, or enthusiastical confidences, at all avail him. (Note, Gal. 5:1—6.) For Christ is the believer's "Life;" and if a man do not live in Christ, by "faith working by love" and by the supply of his Spirit, he has no life; whether he be an Infidel, a Socinian, or an Arian, a Pharisee, a Mystic, an Enthusiast, or an Antinomian. (Notes, 2:20—25. Matt. 11: 25,26. John 5:20—23.) To have Christ, we must "receive him" and abide in him, for all the purposes for which he came into the world: we cannot truly receive him in one character, whilst we reject him in another. He will not protect, deliver, or accept services, as a King, from those who will not be taught by him, or who despise or neglect his precious redemption and all-prevailing intercession; and he will not save, as a High-Priest, those "who will not have him to rule over them."

given to us eternal life; and [s]this life is in his Son.

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.) The apostle wrote the things above stated, unto those who believed on the name of the Son of God, to confirm their faith, and to put them upon their guard against the seductions of false prophets; to assure them that theirs was the true religion of Christ, and that "in him they had eternal life:" (Note, 1 Pet. 5:12.) and to encourage their hope, that they might, more constantly and vigorously, exercise and profess this "faith in the Son of God," amidst all the delusions, persecutions, and tribulations with which they met. The epistle might be, as indeed it has been, very useful to other descriptions of men: but this was the primary intent of it.

V. 14, 15. The confidence, which established Christians had in God, respecting the promise of "eternal life in his Son," had an especial reference to his readiness to answer their prayers, through the heavenly Advocate, notwithstanding their sinfulness. They were assured, "that if they asked any thing," however great or difficult, "according to his will," after the prescribed manner, in humble faith, hope, and uprightness; grounding their requests upon his promises, and submitting themselves to his wise and righteous providence: "he certainly heard them" and accepted of their worship. (Notes, Jam. 4:1—3. 5:16—18.) And, knowing this, they were thence assured, that they had the "petitions which they desired of him:" being confident that his omnipotence would certainly effect the purpose of his love, and fulfil his faithful promises. In some things their prayers were evidently and speedily answered; in others, they might be satisfied that they were granted in the best manner, though not exactly as they expected. (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) Even when their requests were for the present denied, they might make themselves sure, that in the best time and way they would at length be answered, in case this was for the glory of God, and their own real and abiding advantage; which would compose their minds, even as if they had already obtained their petitions. (Notes, 3:18—24. Matt. 21:21,22. Mark 11:22—26. Luke 11:5—13. 18:1—8. John 14:7—14. 16:23,24. Rom. 8:24—27.)

Confidence. (14) Παρρησια. See on John 7:4.—In him.] Προς αυτον. "Concerning him." Marg. "The Son of God" (13) is the immediate antecedent, and seems especially intended. V. 16—18. While believers thus asked and received, in their own behalf, that "their joy might be full;" that love, which had been so largely insisted on, would dictate many prayers for their brethren; especially such as had been overcome by temptation, or who were under any sharp chastisement. In general, they might be assured that the Lord would graciously accept and answer these prayers; and in answer to them, "grant repentance unto life," to such as "had sinned, but not unto death," and that he would remove the corrections, with which they had been visited. (Note, Jam. 5:16—18.) Yet they must observe, that "there is a sin unto death," which would be an exception to this rule; nor were they required or encouraged, to pray for those who had committed it.—It had been shown, that apostacy, after an intelligent and credible profession of the gospel, when connected with strong expressions of enmity, could seldom be separated from "the sin against the Holy Spirit." (Notes, Matt. 12:31, 32. 2 Tim. 4:14,15. Heb. 6:4—8. 10:26—31.) This, no doubt, was "the sin unto death," which the apostle intended: and, when it appeared evident, that any person had committed it, Christians were directed to leave him to the righteous judgment of God, without expecting to see him "renewed to repentance," or even praying for him. (Notes, Jer. 7:16. 14: 10—12. 15:1.)—Indeed "all unrighteousness," or every deviation from the perfect rule of righteousness, "is sin," and so deserves death, or final condemnation, according to the law; (Note, 3:4—6.) and all who turn aside from the gospel, or act contrary to it, merit this punishment. Yet "there is a sin," even of this kind, "which is not unto death;" for, being the effect of surprise rather than of deliberate enmity, many who have been thus overcome in the moment of temptation, have been recovered, so that Christians were admonished to pray for their brethren when grievously fallen, if they did not see in them the marks of determined obstinacy and enmity.—The apostle had before observed that none, "who had been born of God," could "work or practise sin;" (Note, 3:7—10.) and he here added, that none of them were left to commit the unpardonable sin: for though such apostates "had gone out from them, they had not been of them." (2:19.) The man, who, as "born of God," does not allow himself in any sin, but watches and prays, in faith, fear, and love, to be preserved from temptation, or supported under it, "keeps himself," by the Holy Spirit, out of the way of this fatal transgression: so that "the wicked one," by whom hypocrites and formalists are overcome and induced to apostatize, is not allowed access to him, or can make no impression on him.—Satan obtained leave to "sift" all the apostles, and he grievously baffled and wounded Peter; but he could touch none of them, except hypocritical Judas, so as to prevail with them deliberately to renounce and betray their Lord: (Notes, Luke 22:31—34. Rom. 7:15—17.) for "the incorruptible seed abode in them," in the genuine faith, love, and integrity produced by it; and therefore they "could not" thus "sin, because they were born of God." (Notes, 1 Pet. 1:3—5,22,23.)

Born of God. (18) Γεγεννημενος εκ του Θεου. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God." (1) "Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world." "Whosoever is born of God sinneth not, but he that is begotten of God (ὁ γεννηθεις) keepeth himself, &c." "Every one that doeth righteousness is born of him." (2:29.) "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin: for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." (3.9.) Every one that loveth is born of God." (4:7.) "Every thing forming an essential part of Christianity is inseparably connected with being "begotten" or "born of God:" and it is evidently intended, that they all coexist in the regenerate.—But would the apostle have reversed these propositions? Would he have said, "He that believeth not that Jesus is the Son of God, is not born of God?" "That which does not overcome the world is not born of God." "He who doeth not righteousness is not born of God." "He that committeth sin is not born of God." "He who loveth not is not born of God." Doubtless he would. But would he have said, 'He has not been baptized?' This is sufficient to expose the absurdity of baptism and regeneration being considered as the same thing, or inseparably connected.

That wicked one. (18) Ὁ πονηρος. 19. 3:12. Matt. 6:13.

V. 19. The apostle, and such established Christians as had "the witness in themselves," in their conscious love to God and each other, hatred of sin, and victory over the world, knew assuredly that they "were of God," born of God, his servants and worshippers, his children and heirs. (Note, 9, 10.) And they also clearly perceived, that "the whole world lay in wickedness," or "under the wicked one." All the human race, unless "born of God," and become a part of Christ's kingdom, abide in subjection to the devil, (who is "the god" and "prince of this world,") and are his vassals and slaves: they willingly do what he requires of his slaves, though perhaps not aware that they are serving him. They are "overcome by him, and brought into bondage" to him: they bear his image; and copy his example of pride, envy, malice, deceit, murder, mischief, slander, apostacy, rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity against God. They do "the works of the devil," and concur in supporting his cause: they have neither wisdom, power, nor will to deliver themselves; and they all must for ever have continued in this dreadful state, if Christ had not "come to destroy the works of the devil." (Notes, 3:7—10. 4:4—6. John 8:37—47. 12:27—33. 2 Cor. 4. 3,4. Eph. 2:1,2.) This general declaration includes all unbelievers, whether Jews or Gentiles; idolaters, or hypocritical worshippers of the true God; atheists, infidels, profligates, profane persons, and formalists; the wise and the foolish; the learned and the unlearned; the rich and the poor; the royal and noble, as well as the base and vile; yea, the moral and virtuous, as well as the vicious. All "lie in wickedness," under the power of unrepented and unmortified sin; or "under the wicked one," as in some way or other doing him service; those only excepted, who "are delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of the Son of God." (Notes, Acts 26:16—18. Col. 1:9—14. Rev. 12: 7—12.) This, the well-instructed and established Christian knows assuredly: and the criminality, slavery, and misery of the human race excite his lamentations, prayers, and endeavours to spread the gospel; as the only method, by which they can be delivered from their abject condition. (Notes, Rom. 10:12—17. Eph. 2:11—13.) Yet other men perceive nothing of it; but are exceedingly offended at the declaration, and at the endeavours used, "to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God."—As the apostle made no exception, in favour of unbelieving Jews in his day; so we can allow of none, in favour of unbelieving, heretical, and worldly and unregenerate men, called Christians, in this present time.

V. 20, 21. The apostle, and his brethren also, "knew that the Son of God was come; and that he had given them an understanding to know him that was true;" (Notes, Luke 21:12—19. 24:44—49. 2 Cor. 4:5,6.) so that their believing, experimental, and sanctifying knowledge of the Son of God, as "the true and faithful Witness," the "Truth and the Life;" and of "the only true God in him," (Note, John 17:1 —3.) was the effect of divine grace, through "the Spirit, who is Truth." (6) Thus, having the "witness in themselves," they knew that they "were in him that is true," coming to the true and eternal God by faith, cleaving to him, abiding in him as their Rest and Refuge, and living in him, by his in-dwelling Spirit. "Even in his Son Jesus Christ:" by union with Christ they were thus spiritually united unto God; because "He and the Father are One." (Notes, John 10:26—31. 17:20—23.) "This person is the true God, and eternal life." (Note, 1:1,2.) The language here used is peculiarly to be noted: it is not obvious to determine, in some of the clauses, whether the Father or the Son was intended: but when "the Son of God, even Jesus Christ" had been mentioned; the apostle made use of a personal pronoun, often improperly rendered "this man" when applied to Christ, but commonly signifying this Person. This demonstrative pronoun has Jesus Christ for its immediate and evident antecedent: and, having said "this Person is the true God, and eternal Life," the apostle concluded, by solemnly cautioning his beloved "children" to "keep themselves from idols;" which must imply, that they would do this, by adhering to the worship of the Son, as "the true God and eternal Life," and as One with the Father who sent him. The Scripture, and the New Testament especially, was expressly intended to draw men off from the worship of idols of every kind, to "serve the One, living, and true God;" and can it possibly be imagined, for a moment, that an inspired writer should speak in this manner of Jesus Christ; if he had not been, equally with the Father, the proper object of all adoration? If the worship of the Son of God be idolatry, (as it must be, if he be no more than a creature,) surely the apostle introduced his caution against idols in a very unaccountable manner! But if the triune JEHOVAH, "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit," three Persons in one undivided Godhead, be the Object, and the only Object, of divine adoration: nothing could be more proper and emphatical: for the Jews, rejecting the Son, and professing to worship God in One Person, (as the Mohammedans, Deists, Socinians, and others in after ages, have done,) had really changed the true Object of worship, the God of the Bible, for an imaginary Being; and could not be exculpated from the charge of idolatry: for they could not be discriminated from those who worshipped the Supreme Being, under the name of Jupiter, or Baal. (Notes, 1 Kings 18:17—21.) So that nominal Christians, in these days, (and not only in the church of Rome,) have more need to be warned to "keep themselves from idols," than it is generally supposed; and to be careful that they adore the triune God, in whose name Christ commanded that his disciples should be baptized; and that, whilst they "bow their knees to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus," they forget not to "honour the Son even as they honour the Father who sent him," (Notes, 2:20—25. John 5:20—23. 2 John 7—11.) in dependence on the omnipresent and divine Spirit, and under his guidance; that "the grace of the Lord Jesus, and the love of God the Father, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost," "may be with them at all times." (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 13:11—14, v. 14.)—We know. (20) Is there in these clauses nothing like personal assurance of acceptance and salvation, arising from inward consciousness of having been enlightened in that knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ, which is eternal life?—Him that is true. (20) Τῳ ἀληθινῳ. Rev. 3:7,14.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. True faith in Christ always springs from regeneration; and all, who are not "born of God," are either infidels and avowed unbelievers, or have only a dead and unprofitable faith.—Real Christians "show their faith by their works;" they "love God;" and all whom they judge to be his children; and this is proved to be genuine, by the pleasure which they take in keeping their Father's commandments. For, instead of deeming them "grievous," they seek liberty and happiness in obeying them. By a new and divine nature, and the grace of the Holy Spirit, and by the exercise of faith in the testimony, the promise, the power, and the love of God, they gradually acquire "a victory over the world;" and learn habitually to do the will of God, without being seduced, persuaded, or affrighted from it, by any persons or objects in the world around them. Indeed this victory cannot be acquired without conflict; and it is never absolutely perfect in this life: yet our faith prevails so far above what any other principle can do, that we may boldly say, "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" Let then all who profess to believe the gospel, inquire whether they have attained, or are contending for, this victory. For we must all, after Christ's example, "overcome the world," or it will overcome us to our final ruin. (John 16:33.)—Indeed a worldly religion, exhibiting the appearance of evangelical doctrine, is the peculiar danger of the present day, and gives infidels and heretics of every name their chief advantage, against the great and glorious truths of the sacred Scriptures. The gospel, which is so abundantly attested, by all the Persons in the Godhead, by miracles and prophecies, by the peculiar ordinances of the new dispensation, by the holy lives, patient sufferings, and joyful deaths of apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, relates especially to Emmanuel, to the efficacy of his atoning blood, and "the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience:" and as the miraculous powers communicated by the Holy Spirit bore witness to the apostle's doctrine; so his new creating work in our hearts, manifested in our holy lives, attests our interest in the great redemption of the Son of God: nor can this deceive us, "because the Spirit is Truth." As Jesus, therefore, "came not by water only," or by blood only, "but by water and blood;" let us never attempt to separate what God has thus joined together: for the holy lives of all who profess the doctrine of grace, is that testimony to the truth, which is at present principally wanting, in order to "stop the mouths," and silence the objections, of all who oppose them.

V. 9—13. Nothing can be more absurd, than the claim of those men, who will be satisfied with nothing but strictly logical demonstration in matters of religion: whilst, in the ordinary affairs of life, they do not hesitate to proceed on credible human testimony, and would deem him out of his senses who refused to do so: whereas, if "we receive the witness of men," surely "the witness of God is greater!" Indeed, it is impossible, that the invisible things of God and the eternal world should be known, except by faith receiving the information of divine revelation: for in what other conceivable way can we know the incomprehensible perfections of God, his inscrutable counsels, or the manner in which he will show mercy to his rebellious creatures? These are not subjects for man to discover, to know, or demonstrate, by speculation or abstract reasonings: but will always be best understood by those who most simply believe the "sure testimony of God" respecting them. And indeed "they, who believe in the Son of God," have an inward testimony to the truth, through the illumination, renewal, and consolations of the Holy Spirit, and in their own happy experience; which, when possessed in a large degree, is a rational foundation of the most entire confidence, that can possibly be had by those who have not come to the immediate vision and enjoyment of God. But can it be expected, that this "secret of the LORD should be with those," who do not believe his word, and who treat Him, who is the Truth itself, as a liar and deceiver? This is the case of all "who believe not the record which God hath given of his Son:" and it does not become them to censure the steadfastness of experienced Christians as obstinacy, or their consolations as enthusiasm, when these are so fully warranted by the word of God. Disregarding then the self-wise reasonings of such incompetent judges, let us thankfully receive the record of Scripture, that "God hath given us eternal life, and that this life is in his Son; he who hath the Son hath life, and he who hath not the Son of God hath not life." Thus we "may give diligence" to obtain an assurance of our interest in Christ, and know that we have eternal life; and daily grow stronger in faith, more steadfast and rejoicing in hope, "and always abounding in the work of the Lord; knowing that our labour is not in vain in the Lord."

V. 14—21. Confiding in the love of our heavenly Father and coming to him through our great Advocate; we may be assured that he always hears, accepts, and answers all those prayers, which accord with his will, and tend to our real benefit. We should therefore abound in supplication for our brethren, as well as for ourselves: especially seeking to the Lord to pardon and recover the fallen, as well as to relieve the tempted and afflicted: and, as we cannot know who has "sinned unto death;" we should not readily yield to discouragement, respecting those whom we once considered as brethren. We ought to be very thankful, that no "sin is unto death," according to the gospel, of which a man truly repents: and that God will enable all those who are born of him to keep themselves, that "the wicked one" may never prevail on them to sin, in the manner they do who are "given up to a reprobate mind."—If we have so grown in faith and grace, as to "know that we are of God;" we shall readily perceive that "the whole world lieth in wickedness," and under the power of Satan: this will show us how vast our obligations are to redeeming love, and special grace; and it ought to excite our constant prayers and unremitting endeavours, to promote the preaching of the gospel, and the conversion of sinners, at home and abroad, even to the ends of the earth, by every means in our power. Happy are they, who "know that the Son of God is come," and to whom God "hath given an understanding to know," and a heart to rely on "him that is true!" May this be our privilege; may we "dwell in Christ, and Christ in us;" may we be "one with him, and he with us;" for "This is the true God and eternal life:" thus our fellowship will be with the Father and the Son, through the Spirit: and we shall be preserved from all idols and destructive heresies, and from the idolatrous love of worldly objects; and be "kept by the power of God through faith unto eternal salvation." (Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN.

THIS short epistle, and that which follows, being written, as it is probable, not long before the apostle's death, and neither to any church by name, nor to the churches at large, but to individuals; were not generally and unanimously known and acknowledged to be written by him, in the earliest ages, in the decided manner that the preceding epistle was: but their coincidence with it, in sentiment, manner, and language, satisfied all concerned at an early period, that they were written by the same person. Mill observes, that of the thirteen verses in this epistle, eight may be found in the first, either in sense or in expression.—The word rendered, "The elder," might probably be applied to St. John, when all the other apostles were dead, as a title of honourable distinction; for he was the Senior of the whole church: or he might modestly, yet as claiming authority, assume it on this occasion. Some have conjectured, that the church of Jerusalem was figuratively meant by "The elect lady:" and that of Ephesus, where John is supposed to have at this time resided, by "her elect sister:" but it has more generally been thought, that an eminent and honourable Christian matron, well known in the church, was addressed by the title of "the elect lady," and that some other honourable Christian woman, nearly related to her, was intended by "her elect sister." (13) On any supposition, however, the title of catholic, cannot properly belong to it; (Preface to the first of Peter;) as the writer's purpose of visiting, in a short time, those whom he addressed, is alone a sufficient proof.—It is supposed, that the apostle especially intended, in this epistle, to put those to whom he wrote on their guard against such heretics, as affirmed that Jesus was not really a Man, but only appeared to be one; and appeared to do and suffer those things, which the apostles and evangelists recorded of him. This heresy was, in its consequences subversive of Christianity; which accounts for the decided language of the writer against those teachers who held it. (Note, 7—11.) The same decided conduct is, however, equally needful, reasonable, pious, nay charitable, in the true sense of the word, in respect of those who propagate many other opinions, subversive of the gospel, who yet exclaim against the bigotry of those, however benevolent and beneficent in all other things, who determine not to be "partakers of their evil deeds."

The apostle addresses, with expressions of affectionate regard, and with salutations, "the elect lady and her children," declaring his joy in their good behaviour, 1—4. He exhorts them to brotherly love and obedience, 5, 6. He warns them against deceivers, that neither they, nor he, may lose their full reward, 7, 8; and against giving the least countenance to those who did not bring the true doctrine of Christ, 9—11. He hopes to see them shortly, and concludes with salutations, 12, 13.

THE [c]Elder unto [b]the elect lady, and her children, [c]whom I love in the truth; and not I only, but also all they that have [g]known the truth;

2 For [e]the truth's sake [f]which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever.

3 [g]Grace [h]be with you, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, [h]the Son of the Father, [i]in truth and love.

4 I [k]rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children [l]walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, [m]not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, [n]that we love one another.

6 And [o]this is love, that we walk after his commandments. [p]This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it.

7 For [q]many deceivers are entered into the world, [r]who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver, and an antichrist.

8 [s]Look to yourselves, [t]that we lose not those things which we have [t]wrought, but [u]that we receive a full reward.

9 Whosoever transgresseth, [x]and abideth not in [y]the doctrine of Christ, [z]hath not God. [a]He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, [b]he hath both the Father and the Son.

10 If there [c]come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, [d]neither bid him God speed:

11 For he that biddeth him God speed, is [e]partaker of his evil deeds.

12 Having [f]many things to write unto you, [g]I would not write with paper and ink: but [h]I trust to come unto you, and speak [‡]face to face, [i]that [§]our joy may be full.

13 The [k]children of thy elect sister greet thee. Amen.

NOTES.—V. 1—3. The aged apostle seems to have written this short letter about the time when he wrote his general epistle, or something later; and he only styled himself "the Elder," (1 Pet. 5:1.) knowing that the honourable matron whom he addressed, would be satisfied from whom she received it; and properly regard it, without a more explicit declaration of his authority. She seems to have been a person of superior rank; he did not scruple to give her the title of honour which custom had allotted to her; and his acquaintance with her "work of faith, her labour of love, and her patience of hope," satisfied him concerning her "election of God." (Notes, 1 Thes. 1:1—4.) He also addressed her children, who were trained up in religion, and some of them at least were partakers of her grace. (Note, 2 Tim. 1:3—5.) He assured them, that "he loved them in the truth;" in sincerity, and as united by the bond of "the truth of the gospel," which they all believed. Nor was this peculiar to the aged apostle: for all those loved them, who had understood and "known the truth;" that is, all such as were acquainted with this matron and her family. This affection was borne to them, "for the truth's sake, which dwelt" both in his and her children, and in those who loved them; and which would be "with them for ever," as the incorruptible seed of eternal life. (Notes, John 15:6—8. Col. 3:16,17. 1 Pet. 1:22—25. 1 John 3:7—10.)—The same, or a similar benediction, has repeatedly been considered: (Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Cor. 1:3.) except as the apostle added, "in truth and love;" which seems to refer to the cordiality and fervency, with which he sought those spiritual blessings, in behalf of the persons to whom he wrote.

Lady. (1) Κυρια. From κυριος, which is used in various ways, but always as addressing or speaking of one, who is in some respect an acknowledged superior.

V. 4. The apostle had either met with the children of this honourable matron, in some place whither he had journeyed, and found that they "walked in truth;" and evinced their sincerity in professing the gospel, by an habitual conduct consistent with it: or he had witnessed this when he was with them. It however gave great joy to his benevolent and pious mind, to see them tread in their honoured parent's steps, and likely to be instrumental in their future lives to the support of the gospel.

V. 5, 6. I beseech, &c. (5) Εωτω. Matt. 15:23. Luke 5:3. John 14:16. Acts 23:20. Phil. 4:3. 1 Thes. 4:1. 2 Thes. 2:1.—This sort of address suits a particular person better than a whole church, consisting of many individuals.' Macknight. What follows entirely accords to that which has already been considered. (Notes, 1 John 2:7—11. 5:1—5.)

V. 7—11. The influence of the false teachers tended to produce disunion among Christians, as well as to pervert and mislead the unstable. (Notes, 1 John 2:18,19. 4:1—6.) It therefore behooved those to whom this epistle was addressed, and all into whose hands it might come, to be upon their guard, and "to take heed to themselves," to their principles, spirit, and conduct: (Notes, Matt. 24:4,5,23—25. Heb. 12:15—17.) lest the labour of their ministers should prove fruitless, and their expectations be disappointed; and lest even their own losses, self-denial, and diligence in the cause of the gospel, should prove of no use to them. This would be wholly the case of apostates; and, in some degree, of those who were seduced into heretical opinions and an inconsistent conduct. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Gal. 4:8—11. Phil. 2:14—18. Rev. 3:10,11.) Whereas the apostle's desire was, that he and they together might receive a full reward; which would be the case, if they were steadfast in the faith and obedience of the gospel: as this would at present recompense him, by his joy in them, for all his labours on their account; and they would at last be "his crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ."—But, whosoever transgressed, habitually and with allowance, the commandments before spoken of; or "abode not in the doctrine of Christ, had not God" for his Father and Portion; as he only, who "abode in that doctrine," was partaker of the special love of the Father, and the redemption of the Son. (Notes, 1 John 2:20—29.) If therefore any persons came to the place, where this elect lady and her family resided, to propagate their tenets, who brought not with them, in their profession and preaching, "the doctrine of Christ," respecting his Person, as the incarnate Son of God, and his salvation of his people from guilt and sin: they were warned not to entertain the deceivers in their houses, nor to "wish them good success in the name of the Lord:" for by thus countenancing their ministry, they would partake in the guilt of their evil deeds, and be abetting the destruction of men's souls and the dishonour of God. (Note, 1 Tim. 5:21,22.)—They might indeed relieve them, or persons of any character or principles, in sickness or distress; or show good-will to them in any way, which neither gave, nor appeared to give any sanction to their pernicious doctrines: but they must stand aloof from them, and protest openly against them, in this respect; that they might prevent their mischievous success as much as possible.—The heretics especially intended are supposed to be those who denied the real humanity of the divine Word; and explained all that was recorded of his actions and sufferings, as mere delusive appearances. (Note, 1 John 4:1—3.)—Hath not God, &c. (9) 1 John 2:23. 5:12. The latter part of the verse, (1 John 2:23.) which is printed in italics, as of doubtful authority, is here fully confirmed.—'To receive a seducing teacher into their houses, and to have given him suitable accommodations, ... would have made them answerable for all the mischief he might do in the church; such favours being not merely offices of common humanity, ... but at least a testimony of approbation.' Doddridge.—In a commercial phrase, it would have been 'endorsing their notes;' as wishing them success also would have been.—It would not be reckoned uncharitable, to decline all intercourse with those who are plotting to cheat men out of their money, to ruin their temporal circumstances, or to destroy their lives: why then should it be bigotry and want of charity, to refuse to give any countenance to those, the tendency of whose doctrine is to destroy men's souls? Unless this be considered as a matter of far inferior consequence!

A deceiver. (7) Ὁ πλανος. Matt. 27:63. 2 Cor 6:8. 1 Tim. 4:1.—That biddeth him God speed. (11) Ὁ λεγων αυτῳ χαιρειν.

V. 12, 13. The apostle expected much joy and comfort in visiting and conversing with this pious matron and her family, and to be a helper of their joy also: that so their consolation in Christ might be complete. (Marg. Ref. 1.)—We know nothing concerning "her elect sister," who sent salutations to them, to which the apostle joined his hearty Amen. But it is probable, that some well-known and eminent family of believers, residing near to the place where the apostle was at this time, is meant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

A consistent and fruitful profession of the gospel is the principal honour, even of those few of the noble and exalted of the earth, who are thus distinguished: and that love is most cordial and permanent, which Christians bear to one another "in the truth, and for the sake" of it; for this will dwell in their souls to eternity, and be with them as the source of most perfect felicity.—All, who know and love the gospel, will love such as profess and adorn it; and will pray, that "grace may be with them, even mercy and peace, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love:" and it greatly rejoices faithful and zealous ministers, to see the honourable of the earth employ their influence, and improve their talents, to promote true religion; to observe them educating their "children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" and to witness their descendants walking in the truth and obedience of the gospel, as ready to support that good cause while they live, and to bequeath a regard towards it to the succeeding generation.—Some few families of this kind are found among us: may "the Lord bless them more and more, and their children after them;" and raise up many others to copy their example! For, alas, most of the superior orders in the community are rapidly diffusing irreligion, infidelity, and vice, in their extensive circles; and preparing to leave them as a fatal legacy to their posterity!—We should employ every argument and persuasion, to induce Christians to abound in love of their brethren, and to render obedience to all the Lord's commandments: for those "many deceivers, who confess not, that Jesus Christ," the Son of God, "is come in the flesh," "to redeem us to God with his blood," will have great success among such professed Christians, as are not "rooted and grounded in love," and taught to delight in God's commandments. As such deceivers and antichrists multiply on every side, it behooves us "to look to ourselves" and to each other, especially ministers to their people, and parents to their children; "that we may not lose the things which we have wrought, but receive a full reward." Let us then equally disregard those who "transgress the commandments," and those who "abide not in the doctrine of Christ;" that, by maintaining and obeying the truth, we may "have both the Father and the Son," for our "Shield and exceeding great Reward." Let us protest against such teachers as do not bring with them "the doctrine of Christ;" not giving them any entertainment, and not seeming to "wish them God speed;" lest any should by our means be induced to hearken to their "damnable heresies," and so we should be found "partakers of their evil deeds;" which, though little suspected, are often a thousand times more mischievous to mankind than those of profligates, or even assassins; as they murder far more souls of men, than the others can do bodies.—In obeying this commandment of God, amidst the clamours which will be raised against our bigotry and uncharitableness, we should be careful to show great candour to those who differ from us in matters less essential, who hold the doctrine of Christ's Person, atonement, and holy salvation: and we ought to pray for those deluded men, who deny the fundamentals of Christianity; and show them kindness, in every way, and by every method, which implies no degree or kind of countenance to their heresies, and which consists with an open and decided protest against them. Thus we shall stand at a distance from all appearance of persecution and intolerance, while we strenuously assert the difference between the gospel of Christ, and the doctrine of every antichrist; and between the love due to enemies, and that which belongs to the saints, in communion with whom we find much of our present joy, as an anticipation of our eternal felicity.

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

'THE writer of this epistle speaks with an authority, which the bishop of a particular church could not pretend to.—For if Diotrephes was bishop of one of the churches of Asia; the bishop of Ephesus' (that is, if not an apostle also) 'had no right to say to him, "If I come, I will remember his deeds which he does." (Note, 9,10.) That language, and the visit made to the churches, denote a man who had a more general jurisdiction, than that of a bishop, and can only suit St. John the apostle.' Beausobre, and L'Enfant, in Macknight.—All inquiries, whether Gaius, to whom the epistle is addressed, was, or was not, the same person mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the epistles of St. Paul, have hitherto terminated in uncertainty. (Note, 1—4.) There can be no reasonable doubt, that "the strangers," and those "who for his name's sake went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles," were evangelists, or missionaries. (Note, 5—8.)

The apostle addresses Gaius, with good wishes, commendations, and exhortations to persevere, in his liberal and zealous support of those who went forth to preach the gospel, 1—8. He cautions him against the presumptuous and malicious designs of Diotrephes; and highly commends Demetrius, 9—12. Giving intimations of an intended visit, he concludes with salutations, 13, 14.

THE [a]Elder unto [b]the well-beloved Gaius, [c]whom I love [*]in the truth.

2 Beloved, I [†]wish [d]above all things [e]that thou mayest prosper and be in health, [f]even as thy soul prospereth.

3 For [g]I rejoiced greatly, [h]when the brethren came and testified of [i]the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkest in the truth.

4 I have no greater joy than to hear that [k]my children [‡]walk in truth.

5 Beloved, [m]thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest to the brethren, and to strangers;

6 Which [n]have borne witness of thy charity before the church: [o]whom if thou bring forward on their journey [‡]after a godly sort, thou shalt [p]do well:

7 Because [q]that for his name's sake they went forth, [r]taking nothing of the Gentiles.

8 We therefore ought to receive such, that we might be [t]fellow-helpers to the truth.

NOTES.—V. 1—4. It has been generally supposed, that the Gaius, to whom St. John wrote, was the same person of whom frequent mention is made in the writings and history of Paul; (Marg. Ref. b. Note, Rom. 16:21—23.) and his character may seem to favour the opinion: but it is probable that John wrote his epistle many years after St. Paul's death. Gaius was a very common name; and the person here addressed appears to have been converted by John's ministry: so that no certainty can be attached to the opinion; nor is it of any consequence.—After an address, couched in that affectionate and fervent language for which the apostle was remarkable, he added his earnest wish "that concerning all things," (for that seems to be the proper rendering,) "Gaius might prosper; and that he might be in health, even as his soul prospered." Gaius was probably of a weak constitution, and had perhaps sustained heavy losses from the cruel rapacity of persecutors; while at the same time "his soul prospered" exceedingly, as the apostle well knew. He therefore earnestly desired the confirmation of his health, that his valuable life might be prolonged; and that all his well-formed designs for usefulness might be prospered, and his ability for conducting them continued and increased. For the apostle had been greatly rejoiced, when certain brethren, (who seem to have been preachers of the gospel,) had come from the residence of Gaius, "and had testified of the truth that was in him;" and of the consistency of his character and conduct, with the truths which he had received and professed. The apostle indeed had no greater joy on earth, amidst all his labours, infirmities, and sufferings, "than to hear that his children," (either Christians in general, or such as had been converted by his ministry,) "walked in truth;" or, when adhering steadfastly to the truths of the gospel, they showed the sincerity of their profession, by the effect of the truth on their temper and conduct: for this would doubtless encourage his prayers, and hope in God, and animate him to more fervent thanksgivings. Indeed it must have highly gratified the zeal and benevolence of his pious heart. (Notes, Philem. 4—7. 2 John 1—4.)

V. 5—8. The apostle thought it proper to commend his beloved Gaius, as one who in all things acted in that manner

9 I wrote unto the church: but Diotrephes, [a]who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them, [x]receiveth us not.

10 Wherefore, if I come, [y]I will remember his deeds which he doeth, prating against us with malicious words: and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, [z]and casteth them out of the church.

11 Beloved, [a]follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. [b]He that doeth good is of God: but [c]he that doeth evil hath not seen God.

12 Demetrius hath [d]good report of all men, and of the truth itself: yea, [e]and we also bear record and ye know that our record is true.

13 I had [f]many things to write, but I will not with ink and pen write unto thee:

14 But I trust I shall shortly see thee, and we shall speak [g]face to face. [g]Peace be to thee. [h]Our friends salute thee. [i]Greet the friends by name.
